FOOD & DRINK AWARDS 2020

Shanghai 上海 Beijing 北京 Guangzhou 广州 Shenzhen 深圳

've always looked forward to the month of October, as the weather gets colder and the holiday season is right around the corner. This year, Halloween will be a welcomed celebration for everyone to dress-up and pretend like the world isn't one giant dumpster fire. With so much happening over the last nine months, costumes should be as current and creative as ever.

To get you into the Halloween spirit, we compiled a second volume of 'Tales from the Chinese Crypt' to remind readers of the otherworldly tales recorded in the Middle Kingdom (pages 42-49).

Elsewhere in the magazine, our newest editor Sophie Steiner shares with readers a plethora of exciting things to do in up-and-coming Wuyuan in Jiangxi province (pages 30-35). Additionally, hear from Henry Novoa, founder of Karate Tiger Temple, as he shares with us the positive impact that karate has had on his students in Guangzhou (page 51).

In The Nation section, we focus our attention on the epic tale of one cyclist's journey from Switzerland to Shanghai (page 12-17).

Lastly, enjoy the National Day holiday break - and whatever you end up doing, be safe. Until next month.

Chinese Airports Roll Out 'One ID' Facial Recognition Tech

By Joshua Cawthorpe

uangzhou Baiyun International Airport has installed facial recognition technology across the airport to enhance passenger security, as reported by Xinhua.

The 'One ID' system being piloted at the airport is part of an international initiative in airports around the globe.

The goal is to apply the technology to security screening, check-in and luggage drop while compiling an information database for each passenger.

At this time, passengers who have registered for the service can reserve the right to decline airport access to their facial information at any time, according to the airport, as cited by Xinhua.

The system has not yet been deployed at departure gates, as part of epidemic prevention and control measures, to ensure that passengers are not congregating and removing their masks to use the system.

The drive to make airports smarter and more convenient comes from the International Air Travel Association (IATA).

The IATA insists that the future of air travel will soon be a document-free process with the implementation of biometric data collection at airports around the world. Thus, eliminating the need to show passports or boarding passes throughout the passenger's experience at the airport.

Here's an excerpt from the IATA official website on One ID:

"Passengers will be able to identify themselves at each airport touchpoint through a simple biometric recognition. The objective is to achieve a truly interoperable system coordination between airports, airlines and governments."

IATA also states that the system will "help combat human trafficking and other cross-border criminal activities" by making it more difficult to travel under false identities.

The system is currently only in place for domestic routes, however, Guangzhou Baiyun International Airport intends to extend the use of One ID tech for all aspects of terminal services.

The One ID facial-recognition system also recently completed a testing phase at Beijing Daxing International Airport, according to Xinhua.

... is how many billions of masks
China exported between March 15 and September 6. State-run newspaper China Daily published multiple figures highlighting the work China has done after a meeting in Beijing where President Xi Jinping presented medals to several role models in the fight against COVID-19. If accurate, that means China exported nearly 20 masks per person in the world, on average, over the past six months.
To also put the statistic into perspective, China produced just five billion masks in 2019.

As the first country hit hard by COVID-19, China turned into a mask-making machine with factories all across the country producing for the domestic market. After China had limited the spread of the virus in March, manufacturers ramped up exports to governments dealing with severe mask shortages as well as other personal protection equipment (PPE) materials. In April, Chinese regulators tightened restrictions on mask and PPE exports after highly publicized complaints surfaced from foreign governments over exported PPE deemed 'faulty,' Reuters reported.

DON'T YOU KNOW WHO I AM?

Faye Wong

Legendary C-pop songstress Faye Wong made the news last month after singing a duet with Alibaba founder Jack Ma on Wong's live broadcast (which are rare). The duo performed the emotional 1996 song 'If the Cloud Knows'. The atmosphere was pretty relaxed, Wong sang from what looked like a karaoke room, surrounded by friends, while Ma joined in virtually. He praised the songstress, saying, "I think Faye Wong sings very well, her (voice) floats from the sky." As for Ma? Some were surprised by his abilities while others muted him right away.

QUOTE OF THE MONTH

"The durians tasted fresh, but they were a little salty after soaking in the seawater for so long. They tasted better after I rinsed them with bottled water"

Said one woman in Guangxi after buying a contaminated durian. In late August, durians were collected from the coastal areas of the region, where they had fallen overboard from a cargo ship. Locals from Dongxing, a city near the border of Vietnam, took advantage by hoarding the floating fruit. After eating the durians, 523 people reported that they were experiencing nausea, stomachaches, diarrhea and vomiting, among other symptoms, including nine who went to hospital to seek treatment.

ravel is big around the National Day Holiday and with many destinations around the globe enforcing COVID-19 restrictions, exploring the Chinese mainland is sure to be a popular choice. According to China Internet Watch, 2019 saw 42% yearon-year growth for domestic travel during the October holiday which, even then, exceeded outbound travel for the week-long holiday. Travelers can expect crowds, queues and (hopefully minor) complications when traveling during peak times. Here are some slightly more nuanced phrases to help That's readers travel like pros.

Please show your itinerary code and green code.

Qĭng chūshì nĭde xíngchéngmă hé lǜmă.

If you are traveling to a new city and you haven't registered for the destination city's health code, then you can ask for assistance like this:

Please help me fill out this form. qĭng bāng wŏ tiánxiĕ zhège biăogé Rather than waste time buying single-journey tickets for the metro, snag a three or sevenday pass to tackle the turnstile. However, it's not always obvious where to buy one, so here is how to ask:

我哪里可以买地铁三日票?

Where can I buy a three-day subway ticket? Wŏ nălĭ kĕyĭ măi dìtiĕ sānrìpiào?

Some popular tourist attractions continue to enforce social distancing measures and require guests to schedule their visit in advance. Call ahead and ask if it's necessary by using this question phrase:

需要提前预定吗?

Do I need to book in advance? xūyào tíqián yùdìng ma?

During peak travel times, taxi drivers will often demand inflated rates for trips that would otherwise be quite affordable. If you don't feel like haggling, then try this polite way of asking the driver to just turn on the meter like they are supposed to:

I toured around my beautiful country as a manager of a circus hat kind of person cycles over 30,000 kilometers and through 27 countries, all the way from their home in the shadow of the Swiss Alps to the coast of the East China Sea? The same kind of person who runs away to join the circus, of course. Meet Dave Muehlemann.

"I'm a 40-year-old guy from Switzerland. I've done a lot of different jobs in my life, but never for the big money. I've worked in an office, as a pizza chef, a waiter on a train and as a nurse caring for elderly people. I also toured around my beautiful country as a manager of a circus."

It was his stint in the circus, perhaps unsurprisingly, that gave him itchy feet, or itchy wheels. In 2013 he rode 3,500 kilometers to the south of Morocco to visit some friends he had met while working in the big top.

"Before I started, I hadn't cycled one single kilometer on my new bicycle. So, I have to confess, it was a bit of a naive project. But in amazing Morocco,

I got a taste for this way of traveling."

So much of a taste that he flew on to Jordan, and then cycled all the way back to Switzerland from there. His 'Mediterranean Tour' covered 13,500 kilometers over eight months. As for this latest adventure, the original plan was to cycle to Tokyo.

"The idea came about in autumn 2013 when I read that the Olympic Games would take place in Tokyo in 2020. Before my departure, I applied for a job at the Olympics. My goal was to be a little cogwheel in the biggest sports event in the world, and hopefully, meet Roger Federer!"

The main road, the Karakorum Highway, built by the Chinese for the Belt and Road Initiative, is in perfect shape

After COVID-19, he was forced to switch his route to Shanghai. The pandemic worked to Muehlemann's advantage in China, though.

"In normal times, I would have been able to stay in China for only two months. But with the special situation, it was five months. It made it possible to cycle 8,150 kilometers from Yunnan and Shangri-La to Xi'an and Shanghai and onto to Hong Kong. This distance is equal to London to Beijing as the crow flies."

Taking things as they come and adapting to the situation is very much part of Muehlemann's philosophy.

"I'm not the type of guy who wants to plan every detail. On the one hand, I'm too lazy for it. And on the other hand, it's often senseless to organize too much; when traveling the world, you have to be flexible, and I also want to be able to make spontaneous decisions concerning my route."

Muehlemann would sleep where he ended each day's ride. "Sometimes I pitched my tent, other times I would get invited in by families, most of the time I went to the cheapest shabby hotel or guesthouse. One memorable evening in Pakistan, some construction workers let me sleep in one of their beds by the side of a remote and dusty road, with noisy trucks driving by all night."

Pakistan was one of the unexpected delights for Muehlemann. "Through the media – it's true – there had been several terror attacks only a few years ago, I had warning voices in my head cycling through this region. I planned to rush through this leg of my journey as fast as possible, doing 150 kilometers a day.

"In the end, I was so surprised by the beauty of the mountains in the Hunza Valley

"In the end, I was so surprised by the beauty of the mountains in the Hunza Valley and Gilgit-Baltistan that I cycled the shortest legs of the whole trip, integrated some hikes and made a very exhausting six-day detour. The main road, the Karakorum Highway, built by the Chinese for the Belt and Road Initiative, is in perfect shape. Next to it can be quite wild and raw – what I really like."

Other highlights for Muehlemann include Tajikistan and the famous Pamir-Highway, stretching across a barren plateau 4,600 meters above sea level, where he rarely encountered another living soul.

The Iranians, meanwhile, were arguably the most hospitable. "The welcoming behavior of the Iranians is legendary – so much so it was almost too much! I cannot say where I met the friendliest people, or where I had the best food. What I can tell you, however, is how many humans gave me something, without knowing me and often without having much for themselves. It was so astonishing and touching."

Nowhere more so in China than Yunnan, says Muehlemann. "It is an amazing region, so diverse regarding the nature and the people, with 35 minorities. This was where I was given the most presents from the people. I spent some time with a young and very generous guy who, on the day I left his small, pretty village, gave me 60 warm quail eggs for my onward journey. Because it was way too much for me, I shared them with the girls and boys along my route."

The children in all countries were the highlight for Muehlemann. "It's a joy to interact with them, even without a common language. I always had dozens of balloons with me, and tied them to a thread so the kids could have some fun for a while."

Muehlemann says that his chosen form of transport is a big advantage when it comes to meeting people along his journey, with people attracted by the fully loaded bike. His trusty steed is a Papalagi GPi of MTB Cycletech – "a robust touring bike with a steel frame and the perfect travel mate for this trip, and even manufactured in my hometown."

The bicycle itself weighs 19 kilograms, while all his kit weighs 24 kilograms, with 3 kilograms of food and drinks thrown on for good measure. Powering all that up Pakistani mountains would require a special diet, one would imagine. Not so, says Muehlemann: "I always ate what I felt like, if possible local food from the street. Nothing special."

In the end, his journey from his hometown near Zurich to Hong Kong took in 30,200 kilometers, with 226 days in the saddle over a period of 18 months, giving Muehlemann time to explore the cities and countries he was in, and "giving my bicycle some time to rest and recover."

He hopes to inspire other people to travel the world in a similar fashion. "Everyone can do it: one week to Nanjing, three days to Hangzhou. It's a mental thing – you just have to start, of course."

Muehlemann says he never felt like giving up – "No, never ever!" And as for whether he would do it all again? "If things go as planned, I will continue my journey on from Shanghai to South Korea and Japan in spring 2021."

ZHAO CHENXI

Founder of Fabric Porn

Interview by Phoebe Kut

Zhao Chenxi, the mastermind behind the 'Make China Lit Again' hat and fashion label Fabric Porn, certainly made a splash in the fashion world last year. Spending time in both Xi'an and California while growing up, Zhao accumulated a well-rounded perspective of China and the US. After graduating, he started his label fabric porn in 2019. The collection features tongue-incheek pieces inspired by Chinese street culture, paired with Western silhouettes. We catch up with the budding designer to see what's in store for season three.

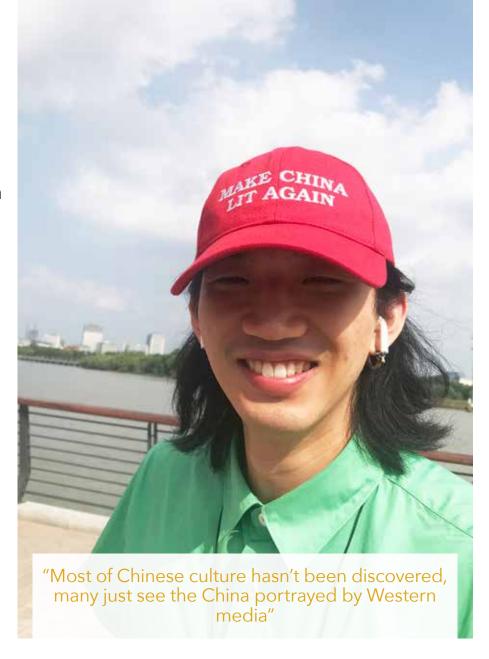

What is fabric porn's mission? What is your biggest inspiration?

As someone who grew up in China, who has experienced both Eastern and Western cultures, I want to bridge the gap, but in a different way. Most of Chinese culture hasn't been discovered, many just see the China portrayed by Western media. I feel there is a lot of beauty and philosophy in Chinese culture that could help contribute to the world. I want to help express that culture.

How was your first Shanghai Fashion week?

It was an all-new experience; I've never done something like that before. The original plan didn't end up working out because of unexpected circumstances, so a lot of changes were made. However, we still managed to gain a lot more followers on social media after the livestream, while previous followers gained a deeper understanding about our brand and vision.

How do you feel about copycats on Taobao?

I've seen other shops with the same or similar t-shirt designs as ours. Unfortunately, the application process for intellectual property rights is long – it takes three to eight months to get the copyright. I think copycats don't hurt brands too much as it depends on their target audience. For example, a fellow designer's brand ranges from RMB1,000-2,000, while copycats are cheap. It's still not a good feeling, though.

What can we expect from season three? When will it launch?

I'm currently working on season three; it will be ready by Shanghai Fashion Week in early October. A lot has happened in 2020. There has been so much hate, racism, bad vibes and negative energy. Although there are many different countries, we are all humans living on this Earth. Therefore, the title of the collection will be 'A Community of Shared Future for Mankind.' I hope for more positive energy and love. We're also making suit jackets dedicated to George Floyd, Kobe Bryant and other influential people from this year. For example, the jacket dedicated to Kobe will incorporate 24 and the color way he is known for.

Do you think the future of fashion is in live-streaming? Are brick and mortar stores dead?

Online shopping is taking up the brick and mortar market, but real stores cannot be replaced. For more expensive pieces, trying them on and feeling the fabric in-store is irreplaceable.

Make China Lit Again

A cheeky play on Trump's controversial MAGA hat, 'Make China Lit Again' was the theme of indie fashion label, fabric porn's debut collection. Raised in China and the US, designer Zhao Chenxi feels that "Chinese people are lacking in their own cultural confidence," which is the inspiration behind 'Make China Lit Again.' The rest of the collection mixes vintage aesthetics with Chinese references from the '80s and '90s. Keep your eyes on this brand, season three's collection is titled 'A Community of Shared Future for Mankind' and will explore societal issues faced in 2020.

Hot Pot Hilarity

Recently, a funny video called #欧美火锅店# or 'European-American Hot Pot' went viral online. Ariana Grande 'stars' in the video, working as a waitress in a hot pot shop while other stars act as patrons in the video, singing lines from their hit songs which 'sound' like Mandarin. For instance, Justin Biebers croons 'love me love me' which is supposed to sound like him ordering 'lamian lamian' (拉面拉面). Other celebs who also make an appearance are Katy Perry, The Weeknd, Lorde and Nicki Minaj.

By Nadine Esterl and Anthony Pontillas

adine Esterl and Anthony Pontillas, co-owners of Evrydy Studios, give us the lowdown on how to take the best photos for your social media feed. Esterl is a German-Ghanaian model, and Pontillas is a photographer who hails from Manila. Both studied design and ended up partnering together to establish Evrydy Studios for your complete commercial, editorial and fashion photography and videography needs.

- Confidence is key Make sure you're comfortable wherever you're taking the photo. Maybe that means moving to a less crowded area. Relax, your confidence will shine through and make for a great photo.
- Angles, baby Cameras and phone cameras have different lenses and create distortion. If you're taking a body shot and want your legs to look longer, take it from a lower angle, tippy toe or slightly place one leg forward. Take face selfies from above because it will make your chin smaller. Never look at the camera straight on, try tilting your face 45 degrees to the the left or right or tilt your chin down. Make sure not to look too far too one side as only the whites of your eyes will show.
- Posing Relax your lips, breathe through your mouth and exhale. If you don't know what to do with your hands, try holding a drink. For men, looking a bit 'angry' works.
- Movement Always add a bit of movement for that 'candid' shot. Flicking or touching your hair always works.
- Preparation If you want that perfect photo, make sure you put on your best outfit, or just touch up your makeup. If you're heading on a vacation, check the location on Instagram and see other pictures people have taken for inspiration. If you're heading to the beach, pack some baby oil it'll give you a glossy shine.
- Lighting If you're in a dark location, make a DIY reflector by using a white towel. Reflectors are amazing and we would recommend a 5-in-1 reflector for beauty or half body shots. Also, having light directly shine from above (aka midday sun), creates shadow on your nose. Have light coming from straight on, and face the light.
- iPhone Hacks Turn on your camera grid to easily center the subject or position them using rule of thirds. Also, the new 0.5x optical zoom feature is great for capturing landscape, scenery and architecture.

MIKE SLIM

Founder of Supoholic

Interview by Ryan Gandolfo

When it comes to popular stand-up paddleboarding (SUP) destinations around the world, people's minds turn towards Hawaii, the Florida Keys and Costa Rica, among others. Needless to say, China's coastal waters don't get the same attention. However, Mike Slim of Supoholic is giving people living in China a taste of the 'SUP' life with tours in Sanya, Shenzhen and Huizhou. Slim shares with us why paddleboarding has yet to take off in the Middle Kingdom.

How have you seen paddleboarding develop in China since you got started?

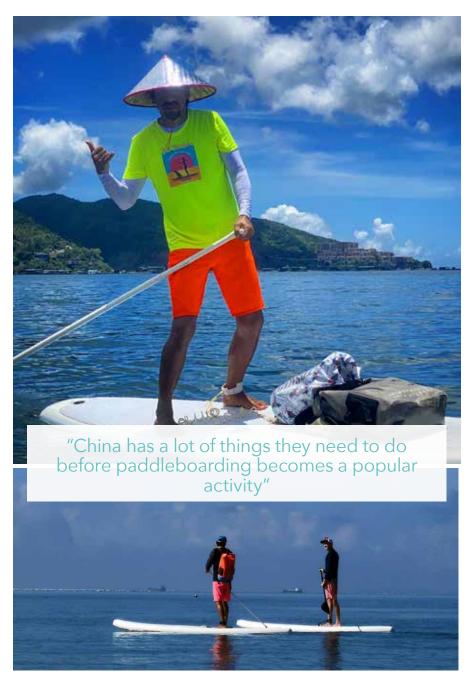

While water sports are very popular all over the world, it seems they are still undervalued here in China. There are two major problems: dirty waters and an apparent phobia of water. China has a lot of things they need to do before paddleboarding becomes a popular activity. I estimate that we're still a few years away before people in the PRC start buying paddleboards for recreational use and begin paddling out on their own. Regarding paddleboarding as a sport, I don't have any forecast. I'm not involved in the sport industry at all, my passion is stand-up paddleboarding (SUP) tourism.

What are the best spots to paddleboard in China?

Any clean and uncontaminated water source is a good spot for paddleboarding. I prefer seas, especially in Hainan province – if you have not been there yet, you should pay a visit. I'm organizing a SUP trip to Sanya over the October National Day holiday. You can also visit my winter paddleboarding club in Sanya.

What have you learned about the country's coastal areas since you started providing tours?

China has one of the longer coastlines in the world. While I've been to many places [along the coastline], I still haven't even seen 1% of it yet.

How does typhoon season play a factor into your tours?

Any offshore wind is potentially dangerous and a hazard. However, strong winds blowing in a predictable direction can be used for a nice downwind ride. This way you can start from one spot and paddle to the other spot through the open seas along with the wind. Downwind rides are great for covering long distances.

As for typhoons, it's totally unsafe for our activities as wind direction is hardly predictable and scattered rains can reduce visibility. Vessels and rocks are arguably the most dangerous obstacles during a storm.

Travel Frenzy

China is getting ready for a big surge in domestic travel for the October National Day holiday as COVID-19 comes more under control. According to China's railway ticket-booking website 12306.cn, many popular train routes were fully booked up within a few hours after presale began at the beginning of September. Due to the longer holiday this year (because of Mid-Autumn Festival falling on October 1), many are looking to use that extra time to travel further. Mid-Autumn Festival is traditionally for family reunions, and after the extended time apart, most are looking forward to returning home. To plan for this, China's aviation sector is preparing for an increase in travelers. For example, Haikou Meilan International Airport is resuming more than 1,500 flights to meet the increased travel demands. The boom in travel bookings is a clear sign that consumers have a strong desire to travel again, hastening the travel sector's recovery and lifting tourism to its peak period this year.

MILE HIGH

Welcome Home

After a six-month hiatus, foreign nationals with valid residence permits will be allowed to return to the Chinese mainland. The Department of Consular Affairs and Ministry of Foreign Affairs announced on its official WeChat in late September foreign nationals with valid residence permits for "work, personal matters or reunion are allowed to enter China" can return without having to apply for new visas. However, for those planning to return to China, we regret to inform you that international flight prices are still sky high.

We checked Trip.com and found that the cheapest ticket on October 2 from

New York to Shanghai is currently around RMB50,000.

So, be prepared to drop a lot of money if you're looking to return sooner than later.

HOSPITALITY HIGHLIGHT

At the newly opened Dawang Mountain Resort in Changsha, guests can both bundle up and dress down for some time in the snow at the Entertainment Ice World followed by a dip in the multi-level outdoor swimming pool that is part of the connected Water Park. With over 270 suites, 60 executive suites, an executive club lounge and a six-room presidential suite, everyone is treated to a broad spectrum of activities and entertainment ideal for all four seasons. The hotel façade is a 100-meter glass tower that provides state-of-the-art sun shading and natural ventilation to the exciting multi-seasonal world inside. From indoor skiing to a 60-meter high indoor waterfall to hanging gardens to shopping facilities, this resort falls in a unique space between architecture and landscape.

HOT SPOT

Tulum, Mexico

ocated along the Carribean coast of Mexico's Yucatán Peninsula, in Quintana Roo state, Tulum is a truly magical destination.

In addition to breathtaking coastline and one of the nicest beaches in the entirety of the United Mexican States, Tulum municipality is home to the ruins of a Mayan walled city of the same name. The archaeological site is a popular tourist attraction and features a number of well-preserved structures, including El Castillo, the Temple of the Frescoes and the Temple of the Descending God. For those keen to learn more about the area's Mayan heritage and culture, a trip inland to the ruins of Coba is strongly encouraged.

Swimmers, snorkelers and scuba divers can take advantage of both the ocean reefs off Tulum's coast and the region's spectacular underwater caves, known locally as cenotes. A diving adventure into one of Tulum's underwater caverns is a truly humbling experience and one we'd strongly encourage you to consider (diving tour operators offer excursions for licensed PADI divers).

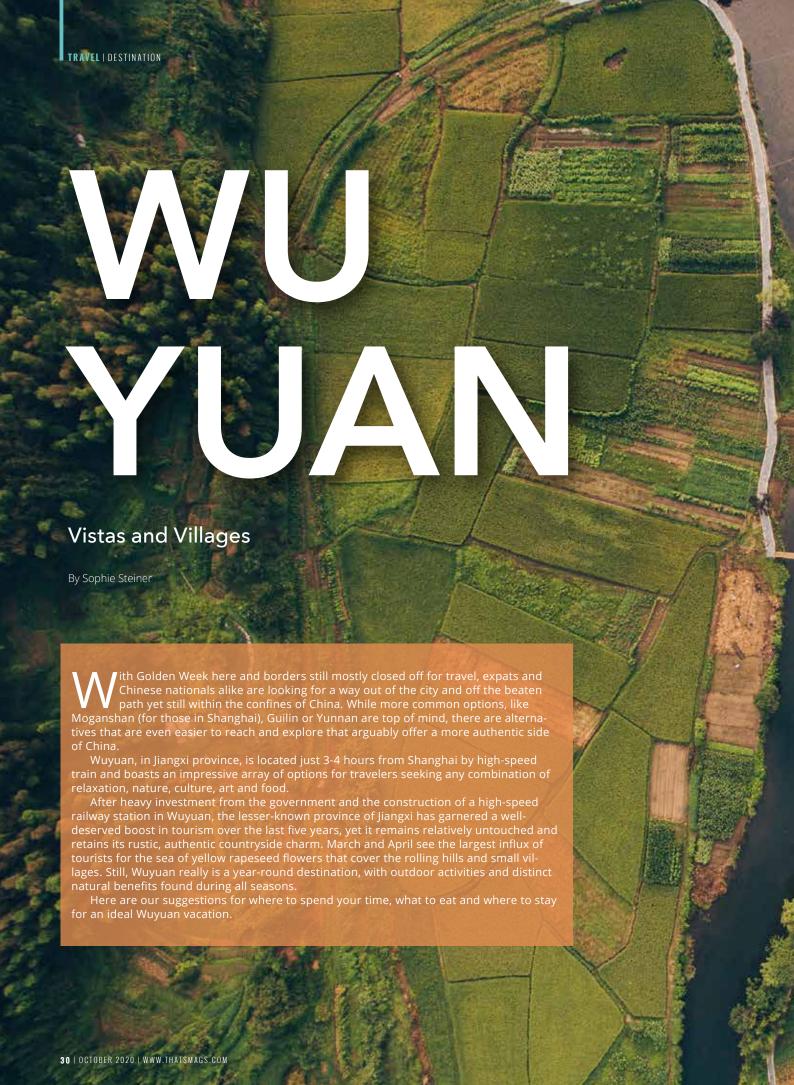

Being a coastal settlement, visitors to Tulum can also expect a wide range of fresh and affordable seafood dishes. Of course, a Corona (the beer, not the virus, obviously) or two on the beach is also in order.

Of note, as of writing Mexico is one of 42 countries around the globe to have zero travel restrictions in place as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic, which means a trip to the land of tacos, cervezas and mariachi bands is very much an option.

Travel | Destination Trips to Take

Village Hopping

Wuyuan has no shortage of small villages, each with their own unique personality and point of interest. Visiting a handful in a day is quite popular, and will usually set you back around RMB300 for a full-day driver. There are a few popular routes, like the East Line that takes you from Small Likeng, a sleepy village with great sunset views and late-night local foodie spots that spill out onto the main road, to Wangkou, famous for its 1,000-plus-year-old 'Moon Well' that's been used for drinking, washing and medicinal properties for longer than most civilizations have even been around. Next, hop to Huangling with its expansive cable car ride and then over to Xiaoqi, a village divided in two where the upper section is more geared towards tourism and the lower area is secluded and peaceful. The North Line also has a few branch options that take you across other parts of the region. Along this route, you can ride a boat through a cave forest park in Lingya, make traditional paper umbrellas at its birthplace in Jialu, admire a Game of Thrones-esque moat surrounding Jujing or bask in Changxi's exquisite autumn foliage.

Xitou Waterfalls

The 4-kilometer loop brings trekkers to 15 unique waterfalls in Xitou. If it's nature sounds you seek rather than squawking photo gawkers, push past the first few falls for the ones near the end of the trail, where you can swim and take in the surroundings in peace. Grab a bite at Yejia Dayuan (叶家大院), a country-style restaurant where the menu is a refrigerator, and fish are caught to order from the pond that the restaurant is built around. Featuring loads of fresh produce and tofu options, this restaurant is quite vegetarian friendly.

Follow up a visit to the falls by submerging yourself into the slow-paced country life at Jiangangling and neighboring Huangcun villages. These authentic villages are located just 5-10 minutes' drive away. They are ideal for an afternoon meander through back alleys to watch people going about their daily lives, fishing, washing clothes and catching the latest village gossip.

Jingdezhen

Every Saturday morning in Jingdezhen, a creative market is held outside the sculpture factory. Young artists display their individually designed and created wares of anything from cups, mugs and plates to scarves, jewelry and even artisan liquor. Known as the world's porcelain capital, ceramics are found everywhere, even molded into patterns on the sidewalk. Check out the Sculpture Factory Main Street for some extra shopping, and swing by Southern Sloth, a new father and son-run craft brewery tucked down a narrow alley. Kai, the face of the brand, focuses on marketing and design, while his father, a Mao-era engineer, is in charge of production. Tao Xi Chuan district, an industrial factory area, has also been converted into an everyday art district, filled with displays, cafes and shops.

Wulongyuan

For the adventure seekers, Wuyuan offers white water rafting at Wulongyuan, albeit tame when compared to more rugged rafting in other parts of the world. With manicured slides and minimal physical activity, the 40-minute journey downriver is still thrilling nonetheless. Confident swimming ability is advised.

Jiangxi Lengfen

The cold bean starch noodles, a popular dish in Jingdezhen, feature unctuous, chewy noodles that soak up all of the flavor of the vinegar, soy and sesame oil dressing. Topped with cilantro, fresh cucumber, crunchy pickled radish, citrusy dried orange peel and insanely spicy chili sauce, the crazy combination of flavorful components is memorable in more ways than one. We found our favorite version at a small noname cafe nestled beside an art gallery in lingdezhen's Tao Xi Chuan district.

Zheyuan Moon Cakes

Zheyuan may seem like any of the other 50 plus Wuyuan villages, but along the main street sits the most famous moon cake baker and Chinese pastry maker in the entire area. Here, people come from the city directly to the shopkeeper's humble store, adorned with a self-made pizza-oven look alike used for baking bing of all kinds around the clock. The buttery black sesame and tangerine peel-stuffed bing crumble like a sugar cookie, and thankfully are available year-round, while the more typically-shaped moon cakes filled with thick red bean paste or a mix of sweetened nuts and seeds put all other moon cakes to shame

Lotus Leaf Wrapped Steamed Ribs with Sticky Rice

Jiangxi is known for its steamed yet flavor-packed dishes and the pork ribs with sticky rice wrapped in a lotus leaf are a taste of pure comfort. Similar to the Cantonese lomaigai, this dish incorporates simple flavors, like ginger, soy sauce and Shaoxing wine mingled with the earthy flavor imparted by the lotus leaf wrapper and extra body from rice flour to create that perfect bite. Think fall-off-the-bone meat accompanied by chewy, fat-soaked, flavor-filled rice. We found our favorite version in Zhangcun, a small village right behind the larger town of Sikou. The restaurant and hotel combo, Jialu Nongzhuang, is popular among locals and tourists alike, and for good reason – their rustic food and wide range of specialty dishes are top-notch.

MAXIMILIAN BUTEK

Delegate and Chief Representative of Delegation of German Industry and Commerce in Guangzhou

Interview by Ryan Gandolfo

Maximilian Butek arrived in Guangdong's capital city in 2018 to take over the German Chamber of Commerce's activities in South and Southwest China. Below, Butek share with That's his role at the German Chamber and how German companies are faring in the Middle Kingdom.

What's your typical day like at the German Chamber?

I don't have typical days, which makes my job interesting. From morning till night, my team and I are in communication with German and Chinese companies, Chinese authorities and other institutions. We help our companies address their business issues of any kind, we support them in finding the right investment destination in China or Germany, we match them with relevant suppliers or distributors and offer professional trainings, such as vocational training for technicians or management training for CEOs. We are in constant contact with the authorities, on the one hand to solve actual and specific issues but also about further projects and concepts on how to enhance the Sino-German business cooperation.

What are some of the more common barriers you see German companies face when entering the Chinese market?

We are in a constant exchange with our member companies and on a larger scale also with the more than 5,000 German companies operating in the Chinese market. Most of them have been active here for decades. A lot has been achieved and German companies in China acknowledge the country's commitment to further opening up, but despite many efforts to improve the market access, German companies in China are experiencing an implementation deficit. Market access and regulatory reforms should go hand in hand to improve overall business environment.

How has your outlook on business in China changed since the COVID-19 pandemic?

Over the years, German companies active in the Chinese market reported stable investment plans. However, we could already see that growth in terms of net sales, profit, investment and employment has been slowing down since 2018. Investment confidence has thus come under additional pressure from COVID-19 as the crisis creates additional uncertainties. From our latest survey, we know that around every second German company in China has postponed or reduced their investment decisions for 2020. However, we can already see signs of recovery, German companies in China are cautiously optimistic. Still, reaching the pre-pandemic levels will remain a tour de force for all market players.

What kind of services does the German Chamber South & Southwest offer to member companies?

We see ourselves as a platform between our members, Chinese companies and the government for experience sharing, knowledge enhancing and business development. Often we are also a kind of safe harbor for members, knowing that they have a strong institution representing their interests on a daily and individual basis. We have a comprehensive 'tool kit' for that, and my colleagues are sound experts in their respective fields, always looking to find the best solution for any problem. Our platform in Greater China extends to 12 offices, but we are part of a worldwide network with 140 offices in 92 countries, and with that we are globally one of the biggest Chamber organizations in the world. This not only materializes in joint projects, but also in a very practical way.

How has your view of economic relations between Germany and the Chinese mainland changed since joining the German Chamber?

The longer I am here, the more I understand that Sino-German economic relations are more complicated as they appear from the outside. The relations are strong, deeply rooted and decades old. German companies are committed, not only to the Chinese market, but also to their employees and their communities. To highlight this, one initiative is our program 'More than a Market,' where German companies showcase their commitment to improving the communities they are acting in. From a business angle, German companies are known for taking decisions rather slow. This makes it sometimes challenging when operating in a different system, where people seem to choose a 'trialand-error-approach' over considering the consequences that actions might have in the long term. In many cases, this approach has proven to be successful. Nevertheless, this often leads to misunderstandings, especially to those who are not yet well experienced within the Sino-German business climate. We see our organization as a bridge builder: To act as a mediator, translator and connector.

Youdao

Released as a search engine by NetEase in 2007, Youdao has developed into arguably China's most popular translation tool. With translating capabilities for 26 languages, we find ourselves often using the app to get accurate and complete translations from English to Mandarin. Similar to the Merriam-Webster's Dictionary app, you can find plenty of example sentences with links back to original site sources.

While the app is positioned to help Mandarin speakers learn English, we've found it's also a great resource for Mandarin learners as well. However, one big drawback is that you won't find pinyin on this app, so unless you can recognize characters, you'll have a more difficult time. Regardless, it's still a great tool for conveying a clear message to a taxi driver, ayi, or Cherry from accounting.

Youdao also offers functionalities like document translation and Al essay assessment (automatically grades English papers and offers suggestions).

Package Preference

In late September, an express deliveryman revealed that the delivery payment for packages fell to RMB0.4 in July, and claimed he only earns RMB0.25 per package after accounting for his personal phone fee. A Weibo survey conducted by China National Radio asked netizens what they deem important regarding delivery. As you can see, package safety is the most important factor for express delivery, followed by speed, price, service and convenience.

INSPECT-A-GADGET

Xiaomi Smart Alarm Clock

We have a tendency to stay glued to our phones right up until bedtime. It's by no means a good habit, and difficult to fix.

Xiaomi Smart Alarm Clock will make it so you can leave your phone in the other room and get proper rest without distractions. With a sleek and simple design, this smart clock will impress with a multitude of neat features. The Xiaomi Smart Alarm Clock can play over 2,000 internet radio stations, wake you up in 80 languages and read you the news (and weather).

And with voice recognition technology, you can tell 'Xiaoai' that you want to snooze without moving a muscle. Brightness and other settings are automatically adjusted with this gadget for optimal performance.

So if you're tired of falling asleep with phone in hand, this clock makes for a better, less distracting bedside companion.

- In early September, Beijing-based private space launch company LandSpace finished its C+ round of financing totaling almost RMB1.2 billion. The company is currently developing reusable rocket technology, and capital is expected to be used for development and launch preparation for LandSpace's Zhuque-2 liquid-fuelled rocket. The Chinese company still has 'light years' to go before catching up with Elon Musk's SpaceX, which is considered the benchmark for reusable rocket tech.

The platform is said to be more focused on user growth, and gives livestreamers more freedom to feature original content.
- 5G plans are on the rise in China, with over 110 million users signed up so far, according to the China Academy for Information and Communications Technology (CAICT). The think tank, which is under the Ministry of Industry and Information Technology, noted that China has the largest 5G market in terms of user size, as cited by TechCrunch.

• Property foreclosures were on the rise this year due to worsening job prospects and shrinking income during one of the worst economic contractions in China in decades. Up to 1.25 million homes were foreclosed in China as of mid-September, according to Taobao. South China Morning Post reported that another factor was borrowers' repayment ability.

hen you think of 'fresh,' canned rice usually doesn't come to mind – but Jiang Feng would beg to differ.

As the founder of Longmijia, a rice brand based in South China, Jiang has taken a concept that started in Japan and turned it into a budding enterprise in China's Greater Bay Area.

"While the concept comes from Japan and their canned rice for natural disaster relief, we're the first to turn it into a viable product on the Chinese mainland," Jiang tell us from his company's main office, overlooking a scenic view of the historic Pearl River in Guangzhou's Zhujiang New Town.

Rice is deeply ingrained in Chinese culture, with the term 'wild rice' (秜) dating back to an oracle bone of the Shang Dynasty (1600-1046 BCE). It's turned into China's staple food and has become a symbol of Chinese culture.

"70% of the Chinese population [primarily] eat rice, while 30% eat mian (noodles) – those of which mainly live in China's northwest region," says Jiang.

Originally from northeast China, Jiang has settled in southern Guangdong and intends to disrupt the rice industry.

When we ask Jiang what sets Longmijia apart from the rest of the 'rice field,' he shares three key differences: healthy, fresh and convenient.

"You can directly add water and start cooking, there's no need to wash the rice: Simply a can of rice and a can of water make for an ideal bowl for the whole family," Jiang tells us.

Longmijia's rice is processed and cleaned in their recently built rice plant in Guangzhou's Zengcheng district, where they take fresh rice from factory to restaurant or household within 18 hours. The cans are sealed with nitrogen to keep the rice from oxidizing and remain fresh for a much longer duration.

Also, Longmijia says this style of packaging will have a positive impact on the environment by avoiding vacuum-sealed plastic wrapping and using recyclable materials.

The result has been surprisingly positive for Longmijia, as the company sold 30 million cans in its first three years.

At the end of 2019, the company secured RMB10 million in a series A1 round of financing, which Longmijia plans to use on building up its supply chain management system, brand marketing and customer expansion, among other things.

Rice to the Finish

Meet the Chinese Company Disrupting the Rice Industry

By Ryan Gandolfo

Branding Brains

As we discover during our visit to Longmijia's Guangzhou office, the company is all about branding.

Dubbed the 'Internet famous rice' (网红大米), Longmijia has continued to innovate on multiple levels. Starting with product packaging, the company spends a considerable amount of resources turning a can of rice into an artistic expression, which helps it stand out among other products on supermarket shelves.

The company has been increasingly involved with livestreaming, even designating a full section of their sprawling office to livestream with notable influencers.

Positioned as a medium-to-high-end rice brand, Longmijia utilizes new media to further its brand messaging to appeal to a growing segment of young people and families with higher wages.

And it's paid off, with revenue surpassing RMB600 million in 2019, one million customers and a 30% customer return rate, according to Cyzone.

Global Grains

While Longmijia appears to be on the right trajectory in China, Jiang is quick to point out the obstacles facing his company for further expansion. "The Chinese market is too big, and America's rice industry is so developed," he notes while adding that the two countries have plenty to gain from closer cooperation amid the ongoing trade war.

Having spent time touring rice plants in the US and inviting overseas guests to Guangzhou for industry conferences, Jiang views both the trade war and restricted travel due to COVID-19 as impediments to growth.

But while it's not clear when those barriers will fold, Longmijia continues to market its product to a massive market in China.

"You can buy our cans anywhere, Tmall, Taobao, JD, as well as supermarkets in Guangdong from Ole to Hema," Zuo Yi, a marketing officer at Longmijia, shares with us.

The company's product scope is also set to expand, as they partner up with different local companies to offer cured meats and other goods that match perfectly with a tasty bed of rice.

Sometimes the story is about a demonic cult hunting for an innocent soul to sacrifice. Other times, the legend involves other-worldly creatures feasting contemporary folklore mainly fictional, these spooky stories widen our imaginations and welcome in a rush of fear and chilling uncertainty.

West, we presume less folks know of the collection of mysterious, goose bump-inducing tales of undiscovered ghosts and creatures from the Middle Kingdom.

of the 'Tales from the Chinese Crypt'. Prepare to discover the metro line once filled with ghosts, scary (and sexual) alien encounters and more.

e turn the clocks back to 1965, when Beijing's Metro Line 1 began construction to tell this tale. According to a narrative from Xu Ziqian in a 2013 Global Times article, the early phases of the subway's construction were mired with problems, including "dangerous accidents" and broken equipment. As urban legend would have it, these issues were the result of vengeful homeless souls whose graves were destroyed while building the metro line.

> To oust or appease these bitter spirits, monks were allegedly brought in to conduct ceremonies aimed at securing the blessing of the now restless ghosts (cue the Ghostbusters theme). To appease the restless souls, the monks promised the spirits that the metro would close before 11pm - since 11pm to 1am is the dead's time of rest (who knew?), according to the Global Times.

The monks also promised the souls that after the subway closed and all the passengers had left, the trains would do one last lap to return the dead to their proper resting places.

According to the story, the remainder of Line 1's construction went smoothly, and no further issues were encountered.

Those who believe this tale point out that Beijing is an ancient city with evidence of paleolithic human habitation dating back 27,000 years, so it is more than likely that human remains were disturbed at some point during the subway's construction.

Line 1 also services the Babaoshan Revolutionary Cemetery – a slightly eerie connection.

However, the problem with this story is that most (if not all) metro lines in Beijing now close after 11pm and the last train arrives at Line 1's Pingguoyuan station at 12.11am most nights.

Much like the disturbing Beijing Ghost Bus tale, this spine-chilling story seems to us to be simply that: a story. What That's can confirm, though, is that Beijing Metro Line 1 is home to two phantom metro stations — Gaojing and Fushouling — both of which are off-limits to the commuting public...

ulder, Scully,
we have another one: An unexplained aerial apparition
- specifically, a
'bright spot' in the sky that captivated an alleged 10 million people in Sichuan and Yunnan.
The aerial event
occurred at 10.38pm

on July 24, 1981, when a bright star-like spot appeared above the Earth and began to oscillate, creating a 'cloud-like' band of light around it. The entire event lasted six to seven minutes.

The band of light that appeared that cloudless night has been referred to as a 'sky spiral' and described as both magnificent and grand (although we imagine terrifying would also be an appropriate term).

Naturally, you have to ask: Was it aliens?

Conspiracy website Before It's News quotes Professor

Wang Sichao, a planetary astronomer at the Purple Hills Observatory and the Chinese Academy of Sciences, as stating the mysterious spiral had an altitude of roughly 650 kilometers and a speed of about 1.6 kilometers per second before disappearing.

Professor Wang believes that extraterrestrials can visit earth. But have they? The late acclaimed physicist Stephen Hawking would likely have disputed this idea. According to Hawking, if aliens visited us, it would be much like the arrival of the first Europeans in America – in other words, not good for the indigenous inhabitants.

Based on Hawking's theory, if aliens had visited us in the past, we would likely know about it – like, really know about it (possibly dead from an introduced space disease or working in alien-run slave labor camps). We will side with Hawking on this one, meaning we highly doubt aliens were responsible for 1981's aerial show.

To debunk the extraterrestrial theory, though, it's essential to look at another famous sky spiral – one that occurred over Norwegian skies in 2009. This particular anomaly has been described as a large spiral emitting a spiralling blue beam. It was seen by hundreds (and potentially thousands) of people.

The Norwegian case was eventually exposed as a Russian missile experiment gone awry. This conclusion lends credence to the US Air Force's deduction that the Chinese sky spiral was the result of a clumsy spy plane.

While the US Air Force has admitted this is just a hypothesis, it somehow seems more likely than an alien light show. We will file this case in the same folder (the strange but explainable, in an earthly sense, folder) as the mysterious 'floating city' seen several years ago in Jiangxi and Guangdong's Foshan.

CHINA'S OTHERWORLDLY 'ALIEN SKY SPIRAL' OF

CHIMA S PHANTOM RULER AND THE ANCIENT CULT HE CREATED

we explore the strange and often creepy world of cult worship — specifically, the Cult of Jiang Ziwen.

Jiang Ziwen was a tyrannical and arrogant leader who ruled over Moling county, now modern-day Nanjing, during the Eastern Han Dynasty.

His death came prematurely, following a violent encounter with a group of marauding bandits.

n this legend,

Aside from declarations of Jiang's brutal nature, noted in numerous online sources, not much additional information seems available to expand upon his ruthless rule. A Wikipedia entry on Jiang claims the ruler developed a deep adoration for wine and women during his time. However, this article boasts only one citation and is thus difficult to rely on.

Jiang's story becomes most interesting after his death, which local legend claims was a restless one. Legend has it that after his death, a phantom Jiang returned to haunt Moling county, looking to recoup the power he so greatly cherished in life.

The ghost allegedly ordered Moling's inhabitants to worship him as the tudi, or deity, of the area – a demand that appears to have been met, according to Tekijät Richard von Glahn's The Sinister Way: The Divine and the Demonic in Chinese Religious Culture.

Although the cult of Jiang Ziwen has received little scholarly attention, researchers believe the area around Mount Zhong, east of Nanjing, was the epicenter of the cult during the Six Dynasties Period, from the third to sixth centuries.

Mount Zhong, also sometimes referred to as Mount Jiang and the Purple Mountain, located in Jiangsu province

Archeological evidence discovered in the Nanking area in the early 1930s, in the form of shrine ruins and two stone tablets, seems to support the cult claims. All the sources we accessed in writing this story agree the Jiang cult did exist – where disagreement arises is over how widespread and influential the group really was.

According to some scholars,

Jiang was never an official tudi, simply a powerful unofficial one. Others suggest his influence stretched far beyond the confines of Jiangsu province, possibly reaching as far as southern China. In 1948, Miyakawa Hisayuki published Rikucho shukyoshi, in which he claims Jiang became a war god for emperors and warriors in the southern reaches of the Middle Kingdom. He claimed the cult spread south due to frequent wars between the northern and southern portions of the country.

Regardless of the Jiang-based faith's range, there is little doubt the tyrant received considerable attention in death – arguably far more so than in life (returning as a ghost often has that effect).

The legend of Jiang, by our assessment, would make a brilliant plot for an Indiana Jones film. It has all the necessary trappings: an ancient dead guy, a ghost, a primeval cult and artifacts recovered in the lead up to WWII. Please take note, Hollywood, it can't be any worse of an idea than the crystal skull adventure.

lien-human sex is not something that's a common topic of conversation. This is likely for several reasons: For one, it's a bit strange, and two, there is no concrete evidence aliens have visited our planet let alone get intimate with our species. Even Hollywood has largely ignored the concept, with only a handful of films exploring the idea, the most notable of which is a passing comment in District 9 about Nigerian prostitutes selling sex to the film's alien refugees. That and a clever bit on NBC's Saturday Night Live about a middle-aged woman who claims to have been the focus of an alien orgy.

While the notion of interplanetary love may seem like something that is strictly bound to the realm of science fiction, it does (allegedly) have a precedent on our green and blue galactic home. This is the story of Meng Zhaoguo – a man from Wuchang, near Harbin in Heilongjiang province, who claims to have engaged sexually with an extraterrestrial.

The tale starts on June 7, 1994, when Zhaoguo was working at a logging camp and spotted lights and metallic flashes from nearby Mount Phoenix. When our humble protagonist went to investigate what he assumed was a downed helicopter, he was hit in the head by an unknown entity or force – knocking him out instantly.

"I thought a helicopter had crashed, so I set out to scavenge for scrap," Zhaoguo told a reporter from The Huffington Post. "Foom! Something hit me square in the forehead and knocked me out."

When Zhaoguo came to, he encountered a tall human-esque female alien, which he described as: "10 feet [3.03 meters] tall and had six fingers, but otherwise she looked completely like a human." Some forms of the story also claim the alien had fur-covered legs.

What allegedly happened next is where the story goes from bizarre to bat-shit insane. According to one version of the story, Zhaoguo was transported back home, where he engaged in a marathon 40-minute sexual encounter with the galactic visitor while hovering above his sleeping wife and daughter. When the space creature finally finished with the genital rubbing, Zhaoguo was left with a mysterious scar on his thigh a mark which, when investigated by a doctor in September 2003, was deemed unusual and not caused by normal injury or surgery.

The strangeness doesn't stop there, though, because Zhaoguo claims to have ascended through a wall to visit the aliens on their spaceship a month later. When onboard, he requested to see his alien lover one more time, a bid that was denied. While on the spacecraft, Zhaoguo was told that his human-alien hybrid son would be born on a far-away planet in 60 years.

"They said in Chinese, but with a heavy accent, so it was hard for me to understand at first that they were refugees. Like me, they wanted to escape their former lives, so they left their dying home," Zhaoguo told The Huffington Post.

In addition to the medical exam Zhaoguo received in 2003, he was also subject to a polygraph test which, according to some sources, proved he was telling the truth. One of the stranger aspects of this story is the fact that Zhaoguo claims to have never heard of UFOs or outer space people until he reported his experience...

Zhaoguo's wife reportedly forgave him for his adulterous alien escapades. He stated: "I told my wife all about it afterwards. She wasn't too angry."

The one thing that stood out to us after researching this story is the fact that Zhaoguo received numerous gifts as a result of his abduction, including a Sony television, a cow and, most notably, a job at a Harbin university... Naturally, this raises some questions.

We must admit there are various versions of this story floating around on the internet, including some where the abductee was already in his home when the sexual encounter took place (instead of being transported from Mount Phoenix). For other forms of this story, do a quick Google search and prepare to burn through several hours of your life.

territory's landscape is a scenic patchwork of rivers, lakes, prairies, forests,
deserts and imposing peaks.

It's also the supposed home of lake monsters.

We first heard the tale of Xinjiang's aquatic leviathans while researching China's best fishing holes.

Although we can't recall the source, the story we accessed made a passing mention of unknown creatures lurking in the depths of Lake Kanas, located in the autonomous region's Altay prefecture.

At the time, we made a mental note of the creepy story (because we simply love weird tales) and moved on with our investigation into China's fishing hotspots. But the story popped back up again in a report by the Guardian titled 'Myth and majesty in China's Xinjiang lake district,' and we figured it was as good a time as any to explore the tale.

Lake Kanas is located in a valley running though the Altai Mountains and is home to sizable populations of ethnic Tuvans and Kazakhs. In the Tuvan language, the lake cryptids are called hobzhk, which translates to 'strange' or 'changing', according to the Guardian.

Local lore contends that the freshwater beasts are tasked with maintaining the lake's water level, by plugging a hole in the bottom to prevent its liquid contents from disappearing into the earth.

While it is difficult to ascertain exactly how far back the Lake Kanas legend goes, we can assume at least 800 years, according to the Guardian, when Genghis Khan stationed troops at the lake to guard the creatures.

Fast forward to the 1980s and Yuan Guoying, from Xinjiang University, reported seeing 50 fish that he assessed to be 10-15 meters long. The fish were reddish-brown in color and Yuan's students estimated their weight could exceed 4 tons.

In more recent times, a video surfaced in the midaughts showing unknown creatures cruising along the surface of Lake Kanas, the footage was aired by various Chinese news programs and can be viewed on YouTube as well.

On September 9, 2013, hundreds of tourists to the lake allegedly watched a creature for several minutes before it disappeared back into the depths. A 20-year-old tour guide quoted in the Guardian piece claims that farmers who have taken their livestock to the shore of the lake have returned later to find only skeletal remains. This claim is repeated on various online blogs and forums dedicated to cryptozoology.

The same guide, named Xiao Yue (Little Yue), also dropped a suggestion as to what the animal might be, telling writer Sam Gaskin, is typically greenish-gray. It also gets big (although, we think 10-15 meters is a stretch), reaching lengths of over 6 feet and weighing up to 200 pounds. The largest one ever caught weighed in at 231 pounds.

According to Gaskin, Yue claimed that fish "exceeding 12 meters in length have been caught on camera in Kanas," although we were unable to find any evidence of this online.

Located in northern Xinjiang, near the borders of Mongolia and Russia, Lake Kanas is also in the right geographical region for taimen, with both aforementioned nations boasting the only significant populations of the fish.

Video of the 'monsters' also appears to back up the taimen theory, with much of the footage showing several creatures cruising the surface of the lake, consistent with the way the species forms 'packs' to chase down prey – earning them the name 'river wolves'.

There are, however, a few problems with assuming the species is responsible for the various Lake Kanas monster sightings. For one, taimen typically only live in rivers and, when they do appear in lakes, it tends to be near a tributary.

The other issue is that the salmonid is extinct or near extinct in China due to overfishing, according to National Geographic.

In July 2005, a team of divers was reportedly sent to search the lake for the monsters at a cost of RMB1.5 million. We presume they didn't find anything, as no follow up appears to have been published.

If taimen does reside in Lake Kanas, it goes without saying that the animal is (probably) not responsible for killing livestock grazing near the lake – further removing it from the monster of legend.

Still, all things considered, and removing the generic debunker explanations like unique wave formations and floating logs, taimen is probably the most likely culprit for the sightings.

But is a 12-meter-long, cow-eating salmon really lurking in the depths of Lake Kanas? Perhaps not. If it ever is discovered though...dusts off fly rod... we'll be the first ones there!

"Technically, the hobzhk are huge fish that love to eat meat"

"Technically, the hobzhk are huge fish that love to eat meat. Their scientific name is hucho taimen." She added she believes the species are a danger to humans and that she cautions tourists not to swim in the lake.

Yue's take on the creature is partially correct, by our assessment, in that we also believe the 'monster' is likely a taimen, sometimes more ominously referred to as the 'Mongolian terror trout'. Where she is wrong is that human flesh is not on the menu for taimen, the largest member of the salmon family.

Taimen, similar to Yuan's 1985 account, has a reddishbrown body, while its head

HENRY NOVOA

Founder of Karate Tiger Temple

Interview by Ryan Gandolfo

With Netflix's Karate Kid spin-off Cobra Kai now available, we thought we'd reach out to Henry Novoa, founder of Guangzhou-based Karate Tiger Temple, to learn about the benefits karate can have on children's physical and mental development. Novoa shares with That's what got him interested in the sport and his academy's success in international competitions.

How did you get started in karate? What prompted you to open a karate academy?

I started taking karate lessons when I was just 5 years old, while living in Venezuela. As a child, I absolutely loved martial arts movies. My parents realized very quickly that I had a keen interest in learning, so they took me to a karate academy. From the very first moment I started, karate became a huge part of my life and my entire attention was devoted to this exciting sport. But I never thought I was going to open a karate academy in the place where martial arts was born! This has truly been a dream come true. When I opened KTT Academy, I knew that I had to share all the life-changing skills that I had learned in Venezuela to young people here in south China. I am very proud and humbled by the fact that I can represent my native country in my host country for a sport that I love so much.

What has the reception been like in South China for learning karate?

It's been completely wonderful! Everyone, from the students to the parents, have supported us more than I would have ever expected. They enjoy karate because it is an energetic activity and builds discipline, as well inner and outer strength. The more that our students train, the more disciplined they become. This is beneficial for them, as they learn to control their emotions and release daily stress. Our parents have slowly begun to understand that karate is not only to defend but also to help with the maturity and lifelong

"In August 2019, our team traveled to Tokyo to represent China, and it brought us the greatest pride and joy we have ever felt " development of an individual's mind and body.

What important skills do you think kids learn from your program?

The KTT program is strategically developed to maintain a fine balance between continuous learning and having fun, as it is very important that students enjoy the learning process. Our program allows students to acquire physical skills (coordination, elasticity, physical strength, resistance) and discipline (self-esteem, respect, courtesy, teamwork, discernment, getting to know each other better and so on). But more than these important skills, we are building habits to live a better life.

What kind of competitions does your academy participate in Asia?

We take part in several competitions around the world on a regular basis. But for us, the most important of all is the World Shotokan Karate-do Federation World Cup. In August 2019, our team traveled to Tokyo to represent China, and it brought us the greatest pride and joy we have ever felt. We won seven medals, including a gold for first place, and it was a moment of many stirring emotions because we saw what we could achieve if we pushed ourselves. All our efforts during the last few years had finally paid off. As for our students, it was an unforgettable experience. Being in another country in an international combat competition, with children from around the world, is something that has undoubtedly helped them with their development and training. It proved to them that with effort and the right mindset, they can achieve all that they have set out to do. It also showed them that it did not matter if they won or lose; all they needed was to be brave, face their adversaries and do their very best. This has always been our mission at KTT to exemplify this.

Name your favorite martial arts movie.

Well, that's a hard question for a karate coach and lover of martial arts movies! My favorite Hollywood flick is Blood Sport with Jean Claude Van Dame. And my ultimate go-to karate-themed film is Kuro Obi. I have watched both so many times and I don't think I will ever tire of them.

China Bans Sex Offenders From School Jobs

A government notice published last month is aiming to eradicate sex offenders from school and preschools in China. Caixin reported that Beijing announced a nationwide rollout of a new policy that will allow access to judicial records of sexual misconduct from various regions in China. The move comes following repeated calls to further restrict sex offenders from entering the education sector as there have reportedly been a rising number of cases involving sexual assault. The government said sex offenders will be banned from receiving teaching qualifications and current workers with histories of sexual misconduct will lose their positions.

ECO HOME

Unplug

You don't always need a new gadget or product to live a more environmentally friendly lifestyle. One simple habit we've developed over the years is unplugging sockets when not in use. In order to save energy (and money) take the time to develop the habit of unplugging your devices when they're not in use around the house. For example, does your oven really need to be plugged in for the 10 hours you're out of the house each day? These appliances are still leeching a little energy while plugged in, so by developing the habit of unplugging, you'll be doing your part to conserve electricity. Teach your children these tips at an early age and they'll be sure to carry it with them as they get older.

hen I first arrived in Shenzhen three years ago, I was amazed at how green the city was. There were trees on every road and no matter how modern and developed the city was, the sensation of being surrounded by nature was always there.

Despite the extremely fast growth of Chinese cities, it is impressive to see how some cities like Shenzhen have carefully planned, designed, developed and maintained a wide range of natural corridors, parks, protected areas, mountains and reservoirs.

For two years, my workplace was located right next to the entrance of a very ambitious project called the Dasha River Ecological Corridor, which aims to protect the Dasha River from its origin to its connection with the sea and has become one of the largest and most beautiful natural corridors in the city. It's a place where everyone can admire and enjoy an urban oasis of wildlife.

However, designing and maintaining a minimal natural environment is not enough to preserve the species that inhabit the city and its surroundings; there are still some conditions that directly affect the wildlife in the city. These are, of course, related to the growth and development the city is experiencing but also to the measurements taken by local authorities and, in some cases, the attitudes and behavior of citizens.

One of the biggest problems I have found is the number of feral cats wandering the streets and the city parks. You can see cats in the mountains and even in protected reservoirs, representing a threat to local wildlife as they lack predators, competition and population control.

Another problem that can be spotted in the city is the extensive usage of pesticides. One of the things I often notice when I visit city parks is the small number of insects that can be seen compared to other cities I have visited internationally. This is due to a strict pest control policy, which does not fully consider the way these practices may affect the complex trophic network that is supposed to be naturally occurring.

It is also common to see supermarkets and street shops selling exotic wildlife, including fish, birds and reptiles. Oftentimes, people will buy these animals as pets for young children who often end up killing them or, even worse from an environmental perspective, releasing them back into nature.

This is a common practice, and it might feel like the right thing to do for most people. However, the ecological impact of releasing an animal into a completely alien ecosystem can be disastrous for both the released animal and the environment. It is known that reintroduced animals can bring with them new pathogens that the environment would not be able to resist. Furthermore, some of these animals do not have natural predators that would keep their numbers in check, which can lead to uncontrolled population growth and a reduction of local species via competition, causing a devastating impact on the ecosystem.

Last but not least, we need to reconsider the common practice of feeding animals in their natural environment. Throwing food to fish, birds, or turtles can cause great harm to our local species by changing their behavior and feeding habits and, in worst cases, even killing them.

It's important to understand that processed foods like potato chips and even bread contain chemicals and substances that animals are not used to, and these can cause digestive problems and, occasionally, even death. Also, animals that are used to being fed would often congregate around feeding spots, leading to disruption of their natural behavior.

Despite the recent efforts by authorities to try and preserve natural environments across cities, there are no environmental education programs that reach citizens citywide. It is important to develop a deeper appreciation of the natural environment where animals are not seen as objects to preserve simply to amuse the local population. It is all too common to see citizens harm local flora and fauna, often due to ignorance rather than malice. We need to start generating consciousness among citizens – starting with students – who will take this knowledge to their homes and will create a positive impact in the city for future generations.

Pink Ribbon Women's Health Awareness Month

Jiahui Health 'Pink Ribbon - We Care More' Women's Health Awareness Month Officially Launches

n September 26, Jiahui Health kicked off its 'Pink Ribbon- We Care More' event series with a small piano concert. The series is intended to honor and celebrate 'Breast Cancer Awareness Month' and promote breast cancer prevention and treatment.

Breast cancer is the most common malignant tumor in women worldwide and the leading cause of death from cancer in women. According to data from the National Cancer Center of China, there were about 304,000 cases of breast cancer in 2019, accounting for 17.10% of annual cancer cases. In the promotion of breast cancer prevention and treatment, the 'pink ribbon' has gradually become a globally recognized symbol, and October has become an important time for the promotion of breast cancer prevention and research.

Pro-bono consultation and surgery for breast cancer patients

Jiahui International Hospital will cooperate with the breast cancer patient community to recruit a limited number of lower-income breast cancer patients to receive pro-bono consultations and breast reconstruction surgery from Dr. Tibor Kovacs, Chairman of the European Society of Oncology and Surgery and Director of the Jiahui Breast Institute.

'Pink Ribbon' bracelets raise money for a worthy cause

During this month of charity activities, every Jiahui visitor will receive customized themed charity bracelets and gift cards. The specially-designed pink bracelets, emblazoned with one of three messages: strength, hope, or faith, aim to promote the 'Pink Ribbon' activity and call on people to be more aware of breast cancer. Visitors can then scan a QR code on their gift card to donate directly to help breast cancer patients.

In addition, Jiahui will also organize a series of women's health fairs at Jiahui International Hospital, with all funds being donated to charity organizations that help breast cancer patients.

Harnessing the healing power of music

Every visitor to Jiahui International Hospital has come to expect soothing music to greet them. But this October, Jiahui is kicking it up a notch by setting up a small stage in the main lobby and inviting young Shanghai musicians to perform live, conveying hopes and expectations for breast cancer patients through the beauty of music.

At the concert site, pink-themed decorations and a small charity art show entitled 'Hope' will serve as accompaniment to the beautiful music. Working together, they will transform Jiahui International Hospital into an even more pleasing environment for patients.

Three such concerts will be held during the 'Pink Ribbon – We Care More' campaign on September 26 (Saturday 1.30-3pm), October 16 (Friday 11am-12.30pm) and October 31 (Saturday 1.30-3pm). Under the premise of complying with the epidemic prevention and control regulations, the concerts and accompanying art show and fairs are open to the public. Jiahui invites everyone to join in honoring Breast Cancer Awareness Month.

If necessity is the mother of invention, then COVID-19's global impact has resulted in a reinvention of teaching and learning processes to ensure the education of millions of students.

ast spring, as the outbreak gathered pace, Xi'an Jiaotong-Liverpool University, an international joint venture in Suzhou, went fully online within just one month. This autumn, with 90% of students back to campus and 10% scattered across the globe, the university is embracing the use of 'hybrid-flexible', or HyFlex teaching methods, which combines advantages of online and onsite teaching in the same class.

While many universities saw an increased use of online teaching as a stopgap to deal with the pandemic, Professor Youmin Xi, Executive President of XJTLU, says the university has long planned to include aspects of online learning even in onsite teaching.

"The pandemic simply sped up the timeline of our plans to move toward the new learning ecosystem we envision for XJTLU's future that includes blending the best of online and onsite education methodologies," says Professor Xi.

Combined online-onsite education is a tool to achieve the university's educational strategy, a departure from the tradition where a teacher imparts knowledge to passive learners, he explains. The departure is necessary since today's knowledge cannot solve tomorrow's problems.

"With advancements in artificial intelligence, robotics, the internet of things, use of big data and digitalization, the world will be a different place in 10 years," Professor Xi says.

"Instead, a university should help students learn how to learn, to have a lifelong learning plan and a future-oriented mind set," he says.

XJTLU, founded just 14 years ago and today educating 17,000 students, used its blank-slate beginnings as an opportunity to find new ways to teach.

"We use a continuous innovation model that enables students to choose their own paths, whether to become experts in their field or future industry leaders," Professor Xi says.

Implementation of online or combined online-onsite teaching provides new ways to exercise student-centered, interest-driven learning. For example, last semester during all-online instruction, XJTLU instructors found that when they posted videos, articles and other resources for students to study in advance, they could save lecture time for more meaningful in-class discussion and analysis.

In addition, last semester many students discovered the benefits of recorded lectures, since they could rewatch the recordings to increase their understanding.

Now that some classes include both online and onsite students, XJTLU has implemented measures to ensure all students receive the highest quality of teaching and learning.

High-definition, light-sensitive web cameras on tripods with top-quality microphones ensure students who are online can see and hear the same information as students in the physical classroom.

"Students both in the classroom and online can ask questions, receive answers and feedback in real time, and interact with one another no matter where they are located," says Roland Sherwood, educational technology manager at XJTLU.

This semester's online-onsite modules pave the way for future learning and teaching that will occur simultaneously between the site of XJTLU Entrepreneur College (Taicang) (to be completed in 2022), and XJTLU's existing Suzhou Industrial Park (SIP) campus.

They also prepare XJTLU students for a future of lifelong learning available via the XJTLU Learning Mall (XJTLU-LM), a unique online and onsite, campus-to-community learning hub that will be at the heart of XJTLU Entrepreneur College (Taicang). The XJTLU-LM will raise the bar for lifelong learning, moving away from a traditional concept to one addressing the need to continually up-skill during working life. On offer will be non-credit-bearing courses, programs and training from leading educational content providers around the globe to benefit students, alumni and the greater public.

In 2019, before the pandemic, UNESCO's Futures of Education Initiative was launched. UNESCO believes it's time for "knowledge, education and learning need to be reimagined in a world of increasing complexity, uncertainty and precarity."

If ever a year was defined by uncertainty, it would be 2020, and at XJTLU that reimagining is taking place right now.

Stray Away

Reacting to Rabies

hina has implemented measures to effectively control rabies cases in recent years. You're less likely to see a pack of stray dogs roaming your neighborhood as you would have a decade ago. According to a 2012 study, nearly 20% of human rabies cases are caused by stray dogs. And with many traveling over the National Day holiday, here's some key information provided by Jiahui Hospital to learn more about the disease and how to prevent it from getting out of hand.

What is rabies?

Rabies is one of the zoonotic diseases (transmitted from animals to human being) caused by a virus. Rabies can infect petsand wild animals, and spread to human being by bites or scratches (usually through saliva).

What are the clinical features of rabies?

The incubation time is usually 2-3 months. It can be as short as one week and as long as one year, which depends on where the rabies virus enters the body and the load of rabies virus. The initial symptom tends to be a fever. Patients often feel pain over the wound or an unexplained burning sensation or tingling (Paresthesia). As the virus spreads across the central nervous system, the lethal encephalitis and myelitis will develop.

There are two subtypes of rabies:

- 1. Encephalitic rabies with main symptoms being hyperactivity, agitation and combativeness, hydrophobia and aerophobia;
- 2. Paralytic rabies accounts for about 20% of all the fatal rabies cases. The progression is slower and longer. The muscles around the wound gradually turn paralytic, then keep progressing to other parts of the body until death occurs. Paralytic rabies may be misdiagnosed as other disorders and lead to failure of report.

ls rabies 100% fatal?

Rabies can be found in over 150 countries, claiming thousands of lives every year mainly in Asia and Africa. It is almost always fatal for human beings once rabies symptoms start to show up. There were 422 confirmed rabies cases in China in 2018 and among them 410 died, with a 97% mortality rate. There were five confirmed rabies cases in Shanghai in 2018 and all died, with nobody receiving standard full post-exposure prophylaxis.

Can rabies be prevented?

Receiving standard and full post-exposure prophylaxis after being bitten or scratched by animals will give you 100% protection. Over 15 million people received the rabies vaccine after being bitten by animals around the globe every year, which indeed saves many lives. There are over 30 officially licensed dog bite clinics in Shanghai, with medical staff having the certificate and standard training by the CDC. The wound management and vaccine quality control are all followed by the guidelines. Shanghai United Family Hospital Dog Bite Clinic is a certified location. You can reach them by calling 021-22163999. If you're based in another city in China, please consult your local hospital to learn more about preventative measures.

That's Horoscopes

Finally, a horoscope that understands your life in China.

By Larold Davidson

Stop being so dramatic - you don't have to tell everyone (including your ayi and the bao'an) that you and your paoyou broke up. You were barely even together. Your heart isn't even cracked, let alone broken. You got more of an emotional high from your best friend's reaction than you ever did from your three weeks of 'dating.'

Scorpio

10.24~11.22

Your spirit food is roasted goose and your spirit drink is liangcha. You've got China knowledge down pat. There is nothing more you need except maybe to learn to read Chinese characters.

Sagittarius

11.23~12.21

Major changes are coming to your love life. You have started to develop feelings for your partner that you'd never thought you'd be feeling. Unfortunately, these feelings could also be the result of passing a kidney stone, so you should probably get that checked

12.22~1.20

Your chronic bronchitis is acting up again. Go see the doctor about getting some non-invasive meds before people start giving you weird looks at Halloween pub quiz night. And no, yelling at people who move away from you on the metro isn't the best way to cope with your constant cough.

Aquarius

1.21~2.19

2.20~3.20

Aries

3.21~4.20

Stop messaging the person that expressed interest in a threesome a year ago. Your significant other is getting annoyed and will make your life hell if you keep lowkey talking to someone who has outright asked for a menage

Taurus

4.21~5.21

You have discovered the joy of Sichuan spicy beef jerky and you will never again go back to the mediocrity of other Chinese snack foods. "Sichuan beef jerky 24/7!" will become your motto. It also helps with your anemia.

It's time to get a real job in China. No, livestreaming and 'modeling' occasionally doesn't count. Your significant other is beginning to get fed up with your leisurely laowai

Gemini

5.22~6.21

As an amateur economist, you are constantly thinking about supply and demand. This is probably your last opportunity to go for a career change and get a ultra high salary as an English teacher because face it, there are so few left in China.

Cancer

Yes, you hate costume parties, but Halloween is coming up at the end of the month. Time to start filling your cart up on Taobao to find a perfect 2020 costume. Please don't dress up as a Minion or Mario and Luigi, those ships have sailed.

You haven't gone back to your favorite Sichuan hot pot since you learned they reuse their oil. but you miss it oh so bad. It may be time to try the hot pot again after all this time. After all, you are a huiyuan (member).

There's a proverb in Chinese that describes your month perfectly, yi yan ji chu, si ma nan zhui (一言既出驷马难追). It mean s that once you say something, you can't go back. You may make promises or say things this month that may haunt you, so think before you speak.
