Editor's Note

APRIL 2021

Here at That's, we do a lot of writing – from daily news coverage and travel guides to stories about ostriches running amok in Yunnan. Writing takes on many forms and is used in countless ways to express ourselves and the world around us. Think best man speeches, eulogies, love letters, or break-up texts – writing is the name of the game. In this month's Cover Story, we uncover the inner workings of Spittoon Collective, a passionate multicultural group of individuals sharing their creative literary and art works within an ever-expanding community. I had the chance to chat with Matthew Byrne, the founder and director of Spittoon, and other key members to learn what makes Spittoon's story a special one. Check it out on pages 36-43.

Elsewhere in the magazine, we talk 'surf' shop about the waves rolling into Sanya in our Nation section (pg10-13). Arts & Lifestyle Editor Phoebe Kut chats with Bottled in China Host Emilie Steckenborn about all things wine and her fascinating podcast (pg15). In the Travel section, Editor Sophie Steiner reminds us of Thailand travel with a feature on the sleepy, pleasant town of Chiang Rai (pg25).

Lastly, I'm happy to announce the brand new launch of That's Sanya. Vanessa Jencks and her team are already off to a great start in China's top beach destination. Feel free to reach out to Vanessa via WeChat (vanessajencks) to learn more about the latest That's addition in the Middle Kingdom.

Regards,

Did a Shanghai Woman Really Spend ¥630K on Gym Lessons?

By Alistair Baker-Brian

When a female Shanghai resident, surnamed Li, felt she was getting out of shape, she decided to sign up for private fitness classes in October 2019.

Satisfied with the lessons at Physical Gym (舒适堡健身中心), Li proceeded to sign up for private fitness sessions worth RMB560,000, according to Shanghai Observer. Following the regular class schedule, the private sessions would last until the year 2034.

When it dawned on Li what she had signed up for, she quickly realized her monthly income of RMB8,000 would not be enough to finance the private workouts. She applied for two separate loans worth RMB204,000 and RMB70,000, respectively. Including the interest she would pay on the loans, the total cost of her private classes over time would amount to RMB630,000.

Things took a turn for the worst in August 2020 when Li was diagnosed with liver hemangioma, a non-cancerous benign tumor caused by clusters of blood-filled cavities. Her doctor told her not to do any rigorous exercise, including her private fitness classes.

With this in mind, Li asked Physical Gym for a refund on the private classes which she had already paid. The gym agreed, but only on the condition that she pay a 20% get-out fee, amounting to RMB112,000. She thought this was unfair and decided to take the gym to court.

The Wenxing District People's Court in Shanghai ruled that terminating the agreements she signed for the lessons was fair because of Li's health problems. However, the court also ruled that Li should pay 5% of the total price of the classes as compensation to Physical Gym.

Health and fitness is big business in China. Estimates put the current number of gyms at around 108,000, with a projected revenue for the sector approximately USD6.2 billion by 2024. Those aged 25 years or younger are thought to be the highest spenders.

American Mike Schramm, a teacher in Shenzhen, said he usually visits the gym five times per week and pays only RMB2,680 for a two-year membership. He told That's that he wouldn't spend any more than RMB3,000 per year on a gym membership. And although he doesn't take private classes, he stressed that RMB400 per hour would be his spending limit if he were ever to do so.

The appetite for gym-going in China is likely to only get bigger in the coming years. Hopefully, the trend will result in slimmer waistlines rather than slimmer wallets.

RANDOM NUMBER

130 MILLION

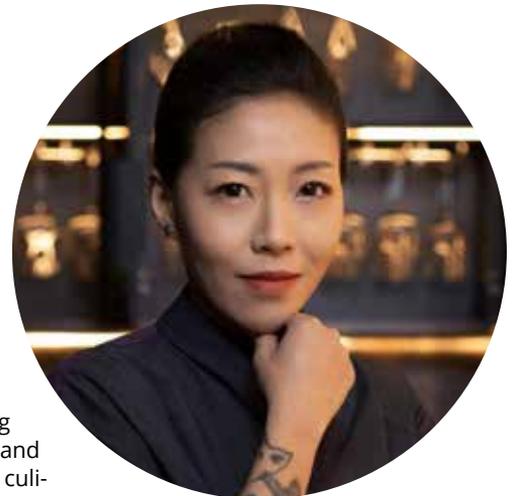

... is how many permanent residents are expected to be in Guangdong province by 2035, according to a recent plan released in Guangdong. The Guangdong Province Land and Space Plan (2020-2035), which was issued by Guangdong's Department of Natural Resources, has also outlined several exciting infrastructure plans for residents, including new maglev lines and airport expansion plans. Guangdong is currently China's most populous province, with a permanent population of 115 million in 2019. To achieve its new population goal, the province will need to have over one million people settle here, on average, for the next 15 years. In 2019, the Central Government released a development plan for the Guangdong-Hong Kong-Macao Greater Bay Area (GBA), which is currently underway for developing the area into a 'world-class city cluster' that's expected to play a role in China's Belt and Road Initiative. Each of the 11 cities in the GBA has been called on to bolster specific sectors of the economy, such as tech and international commerce. A boost in population size will help accelerate the country's development of the GBA.

DeAille Tam, the executive chef of one of Shanghai's newest and hottest restaurants, Obscura, was recently named Asia's Best Female Chef of 2021. The award was voted on by more than 300 industry experts spread out across the continent, who also put together the list of Asia's 50 Best Restaurants each year. Tam was born in Hong Kong but moved with her family to Canada when she was 10. During college, while studying engineering, she fell in love with cooking and decided to leave university to pursue her culinary passion. After receiving the award, Tam said, "This award marks a major milestone in my career. I am humbled that many industry leaders who I admire have followed my evolution in this industry. I hope to be able to inspire others to pursue their passion."

QUOTE OF THE MONTH

"If you leave for the big city, how will your hometown ever develop?"

Posted one Weibo user under a trending topic about whether young adults should leave home and make a life in big Chinese cities. The topic was viewed over 13 million times, with many comments encouraging those who seek an adventure to leave home and find their path in life. However, this phenomenon does leave a void in smaller towns that's become more of a concern in recent years, with some villages mostly comprised of the elderly and children. A common argument for avoiding the concrete jungle was sky-high housing prices and high-pressure employment. They're not kidding, either.

MANDARIN MUMBLES

4 Ways to Use Hui

Since the Two Sessions (两会 - liǎnghuì) wrapped up last month, we thought it'd be useful explaining some of the many uses of the character huì (会). This dynamic character can indicate a meeting or council, an ability, a prediction, or simply the future tense.

The first way a Mandarin learner often encounters huì is as the verb 'can' or 'to be able.'

他真的是会做饭的人
He really can cook [well].

Tā zhēnde shì huì
zuòfàn de rén

你会不会帮我
Can you help me?
Nǐ huìbùhuì bāng wǒ

To express a prediction or possibility, you can also use huì.

小心你会摔倒

Careful, you will fall.

Xiǎoxīn nǐ huì shuāidǎo

If something definitely will happen in the future, go with huì.

老板明天会骂我

The boss will scold me tomorrow.

The State of Surfing in Sanya

By Rakini Bergundy

China is a newcomer to the global surfing scene – but we find more and more young Chinese people sharing their hobby of shredding serious gnar on China’s southern coastline. Surfing is making waves – no pun intended – as the country continues to open itself to less-popularized sports. Here we dive into China’s surf capital of Sanya, a slice of tropical paradise where surfing is becoming a mainstay for riders in Asia.

SURFERS

UP

"Surf culture in China is younger and more chill than say some places like France," Benjamin Bocage tells us over a cup of coffee.

Bocage recently moved to Sanya after a friend asked him if he was interested in helping open up a surf club called 無盡之夏SUN-SEA-SURF in Houhai Village. He had worked in the wine business in the city but decided he was ready for a change of pace last year.

Bocage first visited Hainan in 2013 and discovered Riyue Bay, a popular surfing destination, which is also home to China's national surfing team. He loved it and ended up going back at least once or twice a year. However, Riyue Bay's waves are bigger, which makes it a bit harder to teach surfing.

Bocage tells us that most of his students are young Chinese adults and tourists who are beginners. Where he lives, Houhai Village, the beach is perfect for surfing lessons as the water is very shallow and the waves are gentle.

He notes that Houhai Village is reminiscent of Canggu in Bali. It's a close-knit, relaxed community where you can spot locals in wetsuits walking around the street, enjoying a coffee or just hanging out.

Although China's central government has favored policies to attract foreign talent and open up Hainan in the next five years, Bocage hasn't seen many foreigners living in the island province yet. Hainan is also set to become China's next free trade port, the "first of its kind in the country."

With the pandemic, Sanya has become an increasingly popular destination for surfers who cannot hop over to Bali or the Philippines.

We spoke with Kim Scamman, who has traveled four times over the past year from Shanghai to surf. "There are a lot of places to surf, but sadly every time I've gone the surf conditions haven't been the greatest," Scamman tells us. "The most popular spot is Riyue Bay, and Shaka Surf is a surf club that has become incredibly popular in the past year as they were featured on a Chinese reality show." As a result, the area has become quite crowded, but it's worth checking out if you want to experience the surf culture.

“Dadonghai is more of a touristy party area. The surf is good, it’s easy to rent boards and cheaper than Riyue Bay”

She continues, “Dadonghai is more of a touristy party area. The surf is good, it’s easy to rent boards and cheaper than Riyue Bay. Fuliwan is smaller but way less crowded. It’s a cute beach with small waves, so it’s great for beginners that don’t want to be around people. The area is not commercialized and is quite underdeveloped.”

According to Bocage, the best place to surf year-round in China is Sanya – specifically from October to March.

In the north, he suggests Shilaoren Beach in the coastal city of Qingdao, and in the south, there’s Zhangzhou in Fujian province and Huizhou and Shanwei in Guangdong province.

EMILIE STECKENBORN

Host of 'Bottled in China' Podcast

Interview by Phoebe Kut

Listening to Bottled in China, you can immediately grasp Emilie Steckenborn's passion for F&B and, in particular, wine. Steckenborn has lived in China now for almost 10 years and originally came to explore an opportunity working with a wine importer. In addition to the podcast, she has worked with established wine brands and distributors to build wine education programs across China. She shares with us some top Chinese wine producers at the moment, her favorite podcast episode and, of course, her favorite wine(s).

Where did your love of wine start?

Several factors influenced my decision to get into wine. My family didn't drink much at home, but I would recall my grandparents bringing German Riesling at Christmas or Thanksgiving. I do recall being allowed to take a sip and feeling very elegant!

Long before I knew anything about the business, my father read about how wine was an industry filled with passionate individuals and producers. It combined my love for food, travel, culture and he actually suggested it. As a young adult, I thought it was very classy to let my friends know that I wanted to be in the wine industry. I'm grateful he knew me so well and I kickstarted my career in wine and haven't looked back!

How did you break into your current role?

I first came to explore an opportunity working with a wine importer specialized in US and Canadian wines. At the time, the market was just starting to take off, but French wine – and especially Bordeaux – was the only style of wine consumers wanted to buy. They brought me to showcase the diversity of wine and educate new consumers about various wine regions. Today, the market is very different, Chinese consumers are open-minded and willing to explore new wine regions and styles.

"The most important thing about wine is to be open minded"

I've been lucky to work with some of the largest wine brands and distributors to build wine education programs across China. Educating both internal staff and hundreds of thousands of downstream consumers about wine education and service.

Where are the top producers in China?

The key wine regions in China are Shandong, Ningxia and Yunnan province. All three regions are very distinct. Currently, I'm enjoying Yunnan, it's a boutique wine region where an altitude of 2,000-3,000 meters brings finesse and elegance to the wines. My favorite producer from that region is Xiaoling Estate. I was lucky enough to help out a bit during their recent vintage. What gets me excited about this producer is the small-scale production and hands-on approach. Also, the village of Xiaoling has an interesting wine culture as French missionaries planted vines back in the 19th century. Most locals are actually catholic and there's even an old church in the city which feels very unusual for China!

On the other hand, Ningxia's sunny climate makes richer and bolder wines. Some good producers to check out are Xige Estate, Kanaan and Silver Height.

The Chinese wine industry is still just getting started, and quality is improving each year. If you've had a bad experience with bulk wine from China, then you should give it another try.

What's your favorite episode of Bottled in China?

There are too many! We've published over 115 episodes. In regards to wine, I quite enjoyed speaking with Christelle Chene of Xige Estate. This was a two-part series covering everything you'd want to know about wines made in Ningxia, including why most Chinese wines are so expensive!

I enjoyed learning from Eric Hoang of Zeya (previously Lingya) regarding the seltzer category in China as well as the couple behind a Chinese-made gin: Crimson Pangolin.

When it comes to food, I've discovered the fascinating world of alternative protein where we spoke to the CEO of Nature's Fynd about creating revolutionizing lab-grown food backed by NASA. This podcast made me think about the future of food, and the possibilities we have yet to explore!

What's your favorite wine and how do you like to enjoy it?

That's a difficult question as it changes all the time! I always go for Riesling when going out for a Chinese dinner. Dr. Loosen is an excellent producer that can be found easily in China.

If I'm looking for gifting or something with a heavy meal, then Penfolds from Australia is a very popular and well-respected brand internationally. It has an incredible story and the wines are muscular and juicy. A crowd pleaser!

I personally love to collect old Rioja and old vintages of Chateau Musar. I also enjoy drinking grower Champagne, wines of the Loire Valley and make sure I always have some Tawse Winery in my cellar back home!

The most important thing about wine is to be open-minded.

One netizen commented on the National Health Commission’s ban on single women freezing their eggs. This was a hotly debated topic at the end of February by academics, officials and, of course, on social media. In recent years, authorities have encouraged couples to have more children due to the declining birth rate. However, the commission’s reasoning for the ban is that egg freezing technology has health risks for women and ethical issues. They continue on, stating that the commercialization of egg freezing technology may bring false hopes to women who plan to give birth later in life. Furthermore, the policy is supposedly in place to stop women from selling their eggs and surrogacy, which is illegal in China.

Un Garçon Charmant

Surprise! Luhan, an ex-member of K-pop group EXO, is one of the founders behind streetwear brand Un Garçon Charmant (UGC). He’s kept his association with UGC under wraps for four years now, until an interview with i-D magazine in March. On UGC’s website, the About Us page states, “U.G.C was founded by a bunch of trend setters, internet addicts and senior gamers from the Data World.”

Fans applauded Luhan’s desire to let the brand organically grow during its initial years. Luhan has nearly 63 million followers on Weibo, while UGC’s Weibo has around 47,000 and Instagram, 10,500 followers.

You can snag one of UGC’s signature velvet track-suits starting from RMB1,286.

Doll Domination

Chinese supermodel Liu Wen is the first Asian model to have a Barbie designed in her likeness. Her doll will join the 2021 Barbie Shero collection, which honors inspirational women and girls.

Born in Hunan province, Liu Wen has achieved a lot of firsts during her career. She was the first Chinese model to walk the Victoria’s Secret Fashion Show, the first East Asian spokesmodel for Estée Lauder and the first Asian model to ever make Forbes annual highest-paid models list.

Other women who have been honored with dolls in this collection are: Ashley Graham, Naomi Osaka, Yara Shahidi and Tessa Virtue, to name a few.

There also have been other Chinese women named Sheroes such as Chen Man, a Beijing-based artist, and diving champion Wu Minxia. The dolls usually retail for USD29.99.

Dim Sum Meets Fashion

Vogue-Style Dim Sum by Zijin Mansion

The stylish collection also includes steamed rose bun, which resembles a genuine gorgeous rose that is in full blossom. After tasting, your palate will burst with the subtle fragrance of red bean paste combined with a natural flavor of fresh rose; crispy glutinous rice with salted egg and carrot custard, carrot-styled crispy glutinous rice filled with the delicate filling of fluffy and creamy salted egg custard. The taste renders a long-lasting fragrance and sweetness; crispy glutinous rice with waxberry, under the crispy skin of the glutinous rice lies the healthy mashed purple sweet potato and fresh bayberry flesh. This filling offers a refreshing, fragrant, and sour taste and thus perfectly negating the oily texture brought by fried dim sum.

Fine food is a stylish lifestyle that will never be outdated. One bite of dim sum with a sip of fine tea makes for an ordinary yet unforgettable lunch break at Zijin Mansion. The brand vogue-style dim sum set will create a fantastic experience for the taste buds of those seeking fashion and beauty. Call 010 8520 8913 for reservations.

Time: Monday to Saturday 11:30am-2:30pm

Michelin One Star restaurant Zijin Mansion is the perfect setting to blend exquisite Cantonese cuisine with Western wines. Guests walk out of the elevator on the third floor to an impressive view of the full wine cellar, a living testimony to poetic luxury. Inspired by Zijin Mansion's four seasons, Chinese Executive Chef James Wang and his team combine mindfully selected ingredients with local food culture to develop an authentic Cantonese menu and dishes. From March 25, Zijin Mansion at Waldorf Astoria Beijing happily launches its stylish dim sum set to introduce a selection of ingredients of the highest quality that are handcrafted creations characterized in a vogue-style theme while inheriting the essence of traditional dim sum. From fresh and steamed to crispy and fried, every dish is transformed into a gourmet feast bursting with fashion, beauty and an unparalleled taste.

The vogue-style collection retains several classic Cantonese dim sum dishes, including golden fish steamed shrimp dumplings, steamed matsutake mushroom dumplings and steamed red rice flour rolls with shrimp.

The 11 'Most Valuable Brands' in China That You Probably Never Buy

By Rakini Bergundy

Pantry staples like milk, bread, water and condiments make up the bulk of Hurun's 'most valuable food and beverage brands' of 2020. Hurun Report, a Shanghai-headquartered firm that provides research and consulting services, released their China brand value report earlier this year.

Here are some stats: seven of the 11 are private brands, and the top spot (look right to see who) replaced Yili as the most valuable brand in the F&B industry this year. Its brand value rose 95% from last year to RMB120 billion.

1. Haitian Flavoring

Brand value: RMB120 billion

Soy sauce – a staple in all Chinese pantries and kitchens. Haitian Flavoring, a Foshan-based company, is the largest soy sauce maker in the world.

2. Nongfu Spring

Brand value: RMB71 billion

You probably encounter Nongfu Spring on the daily in all types of stores. The CEO of the Hangzhou-headquartered brand, Zhong Shanshan is the richest person in China as of March 2021, with an estimated net worth of RMB550 billion (USD85 billion).

3. China Feihe

Brand value: RMB43 billion

This is China's most recognizable infant formula producer. Their products are meant to mimic Chinese mother's milk, in particular, according to the 'About Us' page on their website. As for the company behind the 2008 infant formula scandal, Sanlu Group has since gone bankrupt.

4. Yili

Brand value: RMB40.5 billion

Yili is the competitor of Mengniu (the other large dairy company in the number 6 spot). It's also located in Hohhot.

6. Mengniu

Brand value: RMB18 billion

Headquartered in Hohhot, Inner Mongolia, this company manufactures dairy products and ice cream.

7. Wahaha

Brand value: RMB14.5 billion

Wahaha is the largest food and beverage manufacturer in the Chinese mainland and the fifth largest beverage manufacturer in the world.

5. WH Group

Brand value: RMB28.5 billion

Have you ever seen those creepy little sausages in the supermarket? WH Group probably produces them as they are the largest meat producer in China and the world.

9. Teway Food

Brand Value: RMB9 billion

We all need a little spice in our lives, and Teway Food delivers with their hot pot bases, chili sauces and other mouth-numbing products. The company was founded in 2007 in, you guessed it, Sichuan.

8. Dali

Brand value: RMB11.5 billion

Dali has a vast portfolio consisting of pies, wafers, chips, biscuits and beverages.

11. Wanglaoji

Brand Value: RMB8 billion

Chinese herbal tea has made it to the mainstream thanks to Wanglaoji. Wanglaoji's history can be traced back to 1828 in Guangdong and Guangxi provinces. The drink was founded by a doctor named Wong Chat Bong. Wanglaoji is made of seven herbs, contains no caffeine and can supposedly help clear excessive heat and detoxify while quenching thirst. Perfect to pair with spicy hot pot.

10. Taoli Bread

Brand Value: RMB8.5 billion

Taoli Bread was started in 1997 and mainly produces prepackaged bread, pastries and moon cakes. Unlike trendy, high-end bakeries, the company has kept its products in its portfolio to under 30 and uses a central factory and wholesale model. When consumers are asked about the brand, they say it's like a "taste of their hometown, a memory from their childhood."

NOELLA FERNES

British Airways Head of Sales – Asia Pacific

Interview by Ryan Gandolfo

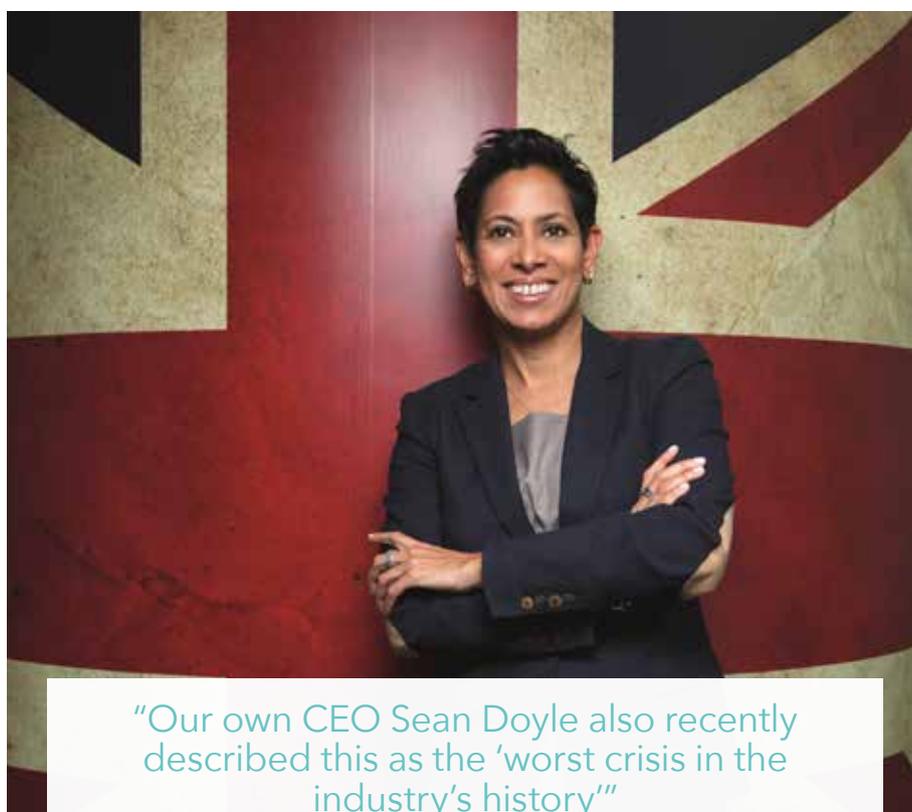

Noella Fernes is British Airways' newly-appointed Head of Sales for the Asia Pacific region. Fernes has over 30 years' experience at British Airways in operational and commercial roles in Sydney, Hong Kong and Beijing. Tasked with driving forward the airline's commercial and external communications strategy in key Chinese markets, she shares insight into how British Airways and the industry at large are gearing up for normalized international air travel.

Would you tell us about British Airways operations in China?

Our connection with China and Chinese destinations is longstanding and very important to British Airways. We started operating a regular service to Beijing in 1980 and Shanghai in 2005. China is a country of 'firsts' for British Airways - we flew HM The Queen to China on her first state visit in 1986; we arranged the first Concorde trip to China in 1995; we were the first international airline arrival at the new Terminal 3 building at Beijing Capital in 2008; and over a decade later we were the first international arrival at Beijing Daxing. Although our Beijing and Shanghai services have been disrupted as a result of COVID-19, China will continue to be a significant market. In 2019, we signed a joint business agreement with China Southern Airlines and, through this partnership, we hope to further strengthen and deepen our connection once we start flying again.

One airline CEO recently said that 2020 was the most challenging year in history for the aviation industry. Would you agree?

I think everyone within aviation would agree. Our own CEO Sean Doyle also recently described this as the 'worst crisis in the industry's history.' The huge reduction in travel and the ongoing disruption to our schedules as a result of changing global restrictions has forced us to restructure our business. Primarily, we need to make sure we provide customers with a safe and enjoyable journey when they are eventually able to come to the UK. We'll also keep beating the drum to promote Britain as a destination.

"Our own CEO Sean Doyle also recently described this as the 'worst crisis in the industry's history'"

When do you expect international air travel to normalize – returning to pre-pandemic levels?

This is difficult to predict and will depend on several factors, although the consensus is at least two to three years. However, given the importance of aviation to so many sectors of the global economy, it's crucial the industry works with governments around the world to restart international travel as soon as possible. British Airways is keen to help develop international standards that provide reassurance to travelers and governments alike. One solution we're actively exploring are digital health travel wallets and secure document verification. We're already trialing the VeriFLY health app on all inbound international flights and are also working closely with IATA on the development of its Travel Pass app.

What are some international aviation trends we might see over the rest of 2021?

A key area of innovation for British Airways is to make the customer experience as contact-free as possible through digital technology – and not just when you check-in and arrive at the airport. For example, we have moved our High Life shop online, meaning that customers can purchase their duty-free goods before they fly, and we will deliver them directly to their seats during the flight. We have even developed a lounge app so that food and drinks can be ordered in a contactless way. For us, it's about making sure we're standing ready to welcome customers back on board and hopefully offering an even better and more enjoyable experience than before the pandemic. Separately, as flying resumes customers will rightly expect there to be a focus on how we can do this sustainably, and despite these unprecedented times, we're continuing to take urgent action to tackle the impact aviation currently has on the planet. In the short-term, this includes improving our operational efficiency, flying more fuel-efficient aircraft and introducing carbon offset and removal projects. In the medium to longer term, we're investing in the development of sustainable aviation fuel, which we expect will be available to power a number of our flights from late 2022, and looking at how we can help accelerate the growth of new technologies such as zero-emissions hydrogen-powered aircraft and carbon capture technology.

Tricky Travels

Japan and the US recently lodged complaints with China's ministry of foreign affairs over allegations that diplomats and citizens from these countries were subject to anal swab COVID-19 testing. While the two countries sound bummed out, Chinese foreign ministry spokesman Wang Wenbin said China adjusted anti-epidemic measures "in a scientific manner" in accordance with relevant laws and regulations. Chinese studies have shown that stool tests may be more effective than respiratory tests in identifying SARS-CoV-2. According to a study published by the Guangzhou Medical University, it concluded that "Detectable SARS-CoV-2 RNA in the digestive tract was a potential warning indicator of severe disease." Many Chinese netizens commented on the reports that incoming travelers need to comply with China's guidelines. The country has mainly reported imported cases of COVID-19 in recent weeks.

The Chinese CDC's chief epidemiologist, Wu Zunyou, stated last month that travel restrictions between the US and China could be lifted as early as August. This remains dependent on the US successfully achieving their target of vaccinating 90% of their population by that time, according to Global Times. So far, under 20% of the US population has received at least one dose of a COVID-19 vaccine, as cited by NPR. Wu speculated that, if additional political barriers are also removed, the two countries could be the first in the world to remove all travel barriers.

HOSPITALITY HIGHLIGHT

Hilton Dalian Golden Pebble Beach Resort

If you're looking for a golf or beach getaway, Sanya and Shenzhen probably come to mind. But another enticing option for families is the Hilton Dalian Golden Pebble Beach Resort. Located on the beautiful beachfront of Golden Coast in Luneng Resort Dalian, this accommodation is secluded from the city center and offers guests a great vacation destination. The resort boasts a spacious outdoor garden and is in close proximity to the Golden Pebble Beach Golf Club (18 minutes) and Discoveryland Theme Park (five minutes). Guest rooms are beautifully designed, with gorgeous views of surrounding mountains and the ocean. There are three restaurants at the resort, serving both local and international cuisine.

HOT SPOT

Chiang Rai

Chiang Rai, a small town on the border of Thailand and Myanmar, is most famous for its ornately beautiful temples and sprawling coffee plantations.

The celebrated White Temple, built by Chalermchai Kositpiyat as a Buddhist offering, focuses on escaping greed and desire while moving towards enlightenment through Buddha's teachings. Hellish imagery of the eternally damned flank the grounds, while the hands of the unworthy deceased, mimicking the River Styx, reach up from the depths to pull the undeserving down to the underworld.

The Blue Temple (Wat Rong Seur Ten) is a modern Buddhist Temple recognized for its bright blue coloring, intricate statues and dragon-like carvings. Finally, Wat Huay Pla Kung is the most symmetrical temple imaginable, juxtaposed against a towering Buddha statue and a nine-floor high pagoda, all sitting atop a mountain that looks like it catches fire during sunset.

After exploring Chiang Rai's night market and stuffing yourself silly with northern Thai curry, rent a scooter for the day and head south towards the Doi Chang, the most famous coffee-growing region in all of Thailand. Skip the highway and speed down the winding scenic route through forests, past lakes, into small towns and across mountains – a natural landscape that is constantly changing yet constantly breathtaking. Although there are numerous coffee plantations, we suggest Doi Chang Coffee Farm. This friendly operation that involves a tour of the entire coffee production process, from growing and picking all the way to distribution and production. Afterward, enjoy the most robust coffee beverages in the open-air cafe attached to the farm, reflecting on your Thai getaway.

GORGEOUS GUANGZHOU

Nestled along the banks of the Pearl River, the capital city of Guangdong is known to some as the third largest metropolis on the mainland and to others as 'Canton' – the birthplace of Cantonese language and culture.

Though today it lacks the same international flair as Shanghai and political prestige of Beijing, for much of history, Guangzhou was China's primary window to the world – a prosperous port city that attracted affluent businessmen, explorers and missionaries from across the globe.

A stroll through sections of old Canton can therefore feel like traveling in Europe, as one encounters Western-style mansions in Dongshankou built by returning overseas Chinese during the 1920s, or discovers Shamian Island: a former foreign concession that once housed international embassies.

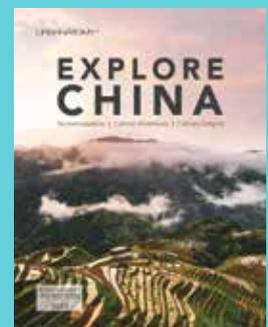

As with many cities in China, the landscape of Guangzhou transformed rapidly over the past 10-plus years, as 100-year-old villages gave way to luxury apartment complexes, shopping malls and skyscrapers in Zhujiang New Town. Modern architectural feats like the Canton Tower, Guangzhou Opera House and Guangdong Museum have become the new cultural landmarks of the city, reflecting both its growth and ongoing relationship with the outside world.

There's a saying that "Cantonese people will eat anything," and a walk through the famed Qingping Market may reaffirm that impression, as its curious spices, medicinal herbs and different animal parts shed light on the peculiar tastes of the local people.

Cantonese cuisine is characteristically lighter than Northern Chinese dishes. Seafood and vegetables feature prominently, as do sweet dishes like char siu (sweet barbecued pork) and claypot rice with Cantonese sausage.

The city was thrust into the global spotlight in 2018 with the arrival of Guangzhou's inaugural Michelin Guide, which celebrated its third edition in September 2020. In short: big things are happening in the 'City of Flowers' and a visit here should be considered a must on any China itinerary.

Canton Tower

Known as the 'Slim Waist' among locals, the Canton Tower stands at nearly 600 meters and is the second tallest tower and fifth-tallest freestanding structure in the world. From a distance, it is a spectacle to behold, and up close, its sheer size is even more extraordinary. Of course, the views only get better if you venture up to the observation platform or take a ride on the Bubble Tram, which encircles the tower at 455 meters up – the world's highest horizontal Ferris wheel. If you want more of a thrill, try the exhilarating vertical free-fall known as the Sky Drop, that 'drops' visitors from a height of 485 meters above the Pearl River.

Yuexiu Park

Despite being China's third largest metropolis, Guangzhou also hosts a fair number of parks that offer protection from the beating sun and hazy streets. Yuexiu Park is undoubtedly your best bet if you're only in town for a couple of days, as you can snap a few photos of Sun Yat-sen Memorial Hall upon entering, see the remains of Guangzhou's old city wall built during the Ming Dynasty, pose next to the iconic Statue of the Five Rams and tour the historic Zhenhai Tower, which now functions as the Guangzhou Museum. There's also a new skywalk that now links Yuexiu Park to several other parks, stretching 6.2 kilometers long. It's a great way to spend an afternoon before hitting the town later in the evening.

Shamian Island

Formerly home to the city's foreign concession area, today this picturesque locale is popular with two groups of people: those seeking gorgeous colonial architecture and brides-to-be. Many couples come to Shamian to take their wedding snaps, and white veils can often be seen fluttering out from between porticos and colonnades. An afternoon walk through the quiet, shaded lanes is a great precursor to dinner at the historic White Swan Hotel, one of the first in the city to achieve a five-star rating. If you come early in the afternoon, wander over to Guangzhou Cultural Park to explore the 13 Factories Museum. Recounting the history of Canton's international trading era, the museum presents fascinating records of early exchange between local Cantonese and foreigners.

Dim Sum

Originating in Guangdong, dim sum, sometimes referred to as 'zaocha' or 'morning tea' in Mandarin Chinese, is a mix of small dishes typically consumed with tea for a leisurely early or mid-morning meal. Classic dishes to try include the shrimp dumpling (xiajiao), egg tarts (danta), steamed custard bun (naihuangbao), shao-mai, fried rice noodles (chao hefen) and rice noodle wraps filled with anything from pork or beef to eggs and shrimp (changfen). Adventurous travelers can opt for a plate of chicken feet (fengzhua).

Qiuda 6 Zaiji

You can't visit Guangzhou without experiencing dim sum and Qiuda 6 Zaiji is one of our favorite spots to indulge in the world-famous cuisine. Helmed by celebrated Cantonese chef Qiu Weiguo, who has served such notable figures as Deng Xiaoping and Queen Elizabeth II, the food here ranges from authentic to experimental and all of it is top quality. The xi-aolongbao here are exemplary, as are the xiajiao and shaomai. The real highlight at Qiuda 6 Zaiji, though, is the danmai chashao bao – an in-house specialty perfected by Chef Qiu himself.

13Factories

One of the most recommended Western restaurants among Guangzhou expat circles, 13Factories has an impressive menu full of delicious burgers, sandwiches and American-style eats like chicken and waffles and jambalaya, among others. Located in Zhujiang New Town across the street from the US Consulate, it's a prime place to grab a bite and a pint (or three) in between trying all the local fare. If you're in town on a weekend, swing by for a boozy brunch to celebrate, well... anything. The nearest metro station is Zhujiang New Town (Lines 3 and 5).

IVAN SEET

General Manager at Commune by the Great Wall, in the Unbound Collection by Hyatt

Luxury villas, an authentic Chinese restaurant, walking distance to the Shuiguan Great Wall and much more. Commune by the Great Wall, in the Unbound Collection by Hyatt makes for a great getaway in Beijing's picturesque Yanqing district. The site is set to officially open on April 17. That's caught up with the new general manager, Singaporean native Ivan Seet, to learn more about the resort.

You recently became the new general manager at Commune by the Great Wall, in the Unbound Collection by Hyatt. Congratulations on your new position! Can you tell us about your previous experience in the hotel industry?

I started in the hotel industry in Singapore back in 2002. I got into hospitality by chance after attending a workforce development fair. That gave me some exposure to hospitality and I just thought: "Why not give it a shot?"

I started in sales and marketing in 2002 and then moved to Beijing at the age of 30. I've been here eight years and now Beijing is a second home for me. The hospitality industry in China is particularly exciting because the speed of progression is so much faster than in somewhere like Singapore. Every day brings something different.

I've had experience with other brands here in Beijing such as Shangri-La but I have worked at Hyatt for the past six years.

Once the hotel opens, what can guests expect to experience there that they can't experience at other 5-star hotels and villas?

Commune by the Great Wall is now managed by The Unbound Collection by Hyatt. One of the most unique things that guests can experience here is the location of the property. There aren't many properties from which guests can get such a good view of the Great Wall of China.

What kinds of cuisine can guests expect to find?

In our restaurants, we want to showcase cuisine from northern China. Guests can experience a range of gourmet food created a 'Kid's COMMUNE,' where we have lots of different activities for children. Parents can go and enjoy spa treatment while the kids can take part in exciting activities run by professionals. Many of the activities are outdoor activities, such as camping, star-gazing and many more.

Media reports have suggested that as early as August, travel between China and the foreign countries could resume. Will the domestic market continue to be a focus throughout 2021? How about the international market?

From our point of view, we are confident in the COVID-19-control measures implemented here in China. Regarding the return of international travelers, we expect that to happen sometime before the end of this year. This will lead nicely to 2022 and the Beijing Winter Olympics.

However, after we open our doors on April 17, we will likely be focused solely on domestic travelers for some time. This will likely include travelers from Beijing as well as from neighboring cities.

With the opening of the borders and the arrival of the Winter Olympics, we will then start to focus more on the international market. Having the Shuiguan Great Wall right next to our hotel makes us very attractive to international travelers. Visiting the Great Wall is often a must-do for overseas travelers. You could even say that you haven't really been to China if you haven't visited the Great Wall!

> This interview has been edited for clarity and brevity.

primarily from northern China because we want to reflect the location of the hotel. We hope that with such a creative and comforting cuisine, we can create a "home away from home" for our guests.

Other than the living areas and restaurants, what other facilities are available at the property?

Another unique aspect about the hotel is our outdoor pool, something you won't find in a lot of other places in northern China given the cold weather conditions. Attached to the pool, there is also a pool-side cafe and bar.

We are also very much a family-oriented property. With this in mind, we have

JAVEN ZHENG

Business Innovation Consultant

Interview by Ryan Gandolfo

Prior to being a business innovation consultant, Javen Zheng was a tech journalist at Southern China Media Group, a publication company with significant influence in southern China. His passion for building a sustainable startup ecosystem and helping valuable ideas spread led him to the role of co-director at Startup Grind Guangzhou, where he's hosted over 30 monthly events to connect entrepreneurs with local startups and help them grow their businesses. We reached out to Zheng to learn more about Guangzhou's startup community and his role with Startup Grind.

How'd you get started with Startup Grind Guangzhou? What's your background?

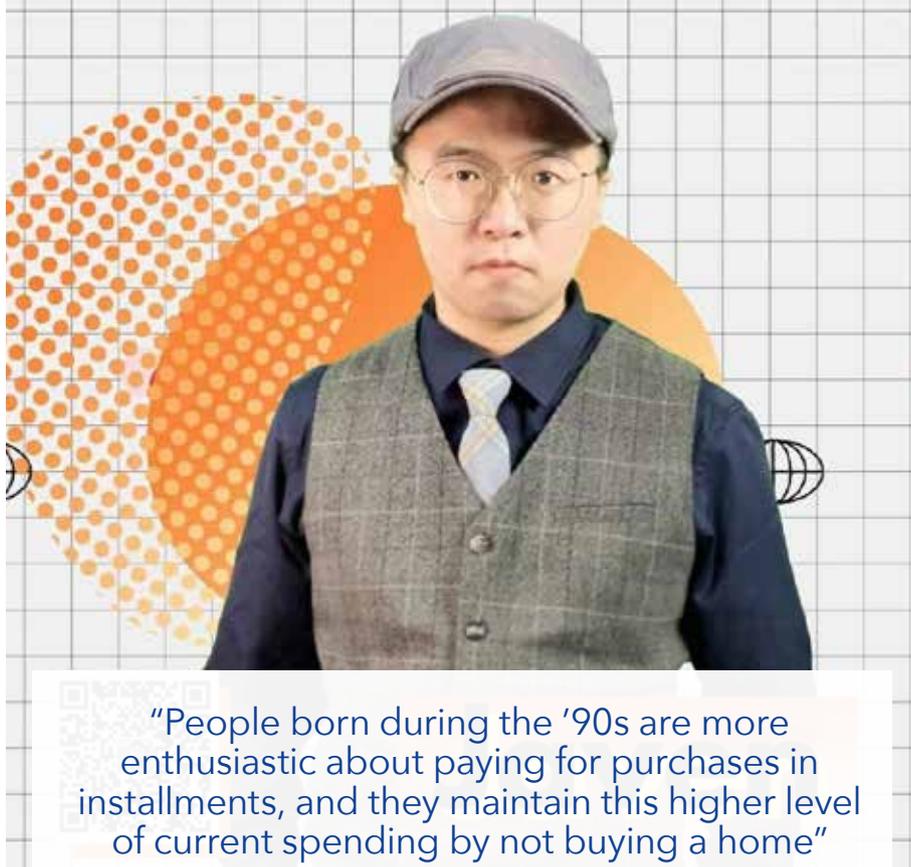

Five years ago, I started my first business in Macao, and my business partner told me about Startup Grind and that they were in partnership with Google for Startups. The format would be a fireside chat between an interviewer and a successful entrepreneur – along with networking and some food and drinks. I remember at the first Startup Grind Guangzhou event that I joined, the speaker was KK Wong, the co-founder of Xiaomi. That event inspired me a lot, and I decided to apply for the co-director position at Startup Grind Guangzhou.

Organizing Startup Grind events is a great opportunity to help startups grow faster and make more new friends to help each other in Guangzhou. It's been a wonderful thing for me.

How would you describe the startup community in Guangzhou?

For the people who want to start their own business, is a great entry point to the startup world. For the entrepreneur who wants to scale their business, it is a good opportunity to connect them to more commercial resources.

You can meet so many interesting

"People born during the '90s are more enthusiastic about paying for purchases in installments, and they maintain this higher level of current spending by not buying a home"

people and possibly find your [business] partner at the event. Startup communities in Guangzhou connect startups to corporations and facilitate mutually beneficial partnerships. Startup Grind Guangzhou community gatherings open up networking opportunities that help build chemistry among stakeholders to potentially cement a partnership or at least learn about the unique perspective of startups and corporations alike.

While covering tech as a journalist in South China, did you notice any trends in entrepreneurship that reflect China's rise in startups?

This past year, we could see several new business trends emerge from the world's second-largest economy. Here are the trends in entrepreneurship that would be worth watching out for.

1. Rise of Chinese Brands

Ten years ago, many Chinese brands made an effort to look like they were a foreign product to attract local customers. Now, things have changed – more and more brands are molding themselves with Chinese traditions and style.

2. Structural Change in Investment and Consumption

In the next few years, the Chinese middle class will become the main force behind consumption. In 2019, consumer retail spending increased 8% year-on-year. People born during the '90s are more enthusiastic about paying for purchases in installments, and they maintain this higher level of current spending by not buying a home.

3. Leader in High Technology

Chinese high technology, such as 5G, artificial intelligence, semiconductors and autonomous vehicles, which have been developing rapidly for several years, is now entering a new stage with China at the forefront.

Are there any differences you've noticed between Chinese entrepreneurs today and their predecessors?

Chinese entrepreneurs today are generally savvier, wealthier and more experienced than their predecessors.

The current generation of successful entrepreneurs largely comprises those with significant work experience and extensive extant business knowledge. Furthermore, many of these founders have overseas experience or have been exposed to international media covering related industries. Chinese entrepreneurs know about cutting-edge technological developments emerging in Silicon Valley and can quickly emulate and adapt those concepts to the China market.

Has Startup Grind Guangzhou had to make any changes over the past year? If so, what were they?

To adapt to the COVID-19 pandemic, Startup Grind Guangzhou launched an online media program and hosted webinars to connect local entrepreneurs and global commercial resources. We found that it's a more effective way to connect local startups and entrepreneurs from all around the world.

Ren Ren Shipin (人人视频) is one of our go-to streaming apps in China. It covers a wide range of foreign movies and TV series in addition to domestic shows and releases. While we love us some 'Netflix and Chill,' if you or your partner rely on Chinese subtitles then a Chinese streaming app/website is the way to go as it usually has Chinese subtitles. Phone Screen Enlarger

One of those typical products that look too good to be true – screen magnifiers for smartphones seem to be a pretty clear scam unlike the screens! We tested a screen magnifier out from Taobao and found that despite the screen being enlarged, the quality drop-off was too much to handle. Admittedly, the magnifier we purchased was under RMB100, however, it's hard to justify much use for this product in a world that's already so smartphone-focused. In the grand scheme of things, we doubt this product will do much to help out our eyesight, but rather collect dust in the desk.

- China is teaming up with Russia to construct a lunar research station – a bold project between the two countries. The station will be “built on the lunar surface and/or on the lunar orbit,” according to a statement released by China’s space agency. Russia’s Roscosmos and China’s National Space Administration are the countries’ equivalents of NASA. Once the station is complete – far into the future – it will be open for use by other countries.
- A recent report indicated that China took the lead in the global 5G market last year, with 200 million new 5G connections that accounted for 87% of the global total. The report, released by the Global System for Mobile Communications Association, said China’s 5G connections are expected to hit 822 million by 2025.
- There’s been a buzz about Bilibili in recent weeks as the streaming site currently has a firm grasp on China’s millennials and intends to double monthly active users (MAUs) by 2023. Eighty-six percent of its 202 million monthly active users are under the age of 35, according to China Daily. However, China consumer and tech expert Michael Norris has noted that the company’s losses grew faster than revenue in 2020 and user stickiness (DAU/MAU) is falling. It’s certainly a NASDAQ-listed company to keep your eye on as the company’s stock price has fallen 30% over the past two months.

6 Staggering Stats on China's Billionaire Ballers

By Ryan Gandolfo

On March 2, Hurun Report released the Hurun Global Rich List 2021, which gives a ranking and breakdown of the world's billionaires (in USD).

According to Hurun Report Chairman and Chief Researcher Rupert Hoogewef, "China has added more new faces than the rest of the world combined" in the past year, with EVs, e-commerce, blockchain and biotech notably the fastest-growing industries.

The combined wealth of billionaires in China is USD4.5 trillion, more than Germany's GDP.

With so many new billionaires, there may be a noticeable difference in China's household income distribution. In 2019, China's gini coefficient – a statistical measure intended to represent wealth inequality – was 0.465, according to CEIC. This represents a big income gap and is on par with many developed countries around the world, including the US.

Here are six staggering stats on China's super-rich elite.

is the number of 'known' dollar billionaires in China – more than the total from the next three countries (US, India and Germany). In 2020, China added 256 billionaires and is the first country to have more than 1,000 billionaires. Hoogewef said the number of dollar billionaires in China may actually be closer to 2,500 – accounting for undisclosed assets.

is the number of Chinese cities in the top 10 for the highest concentration of dollar billionaires. Beijing took the crown as the world's billionaire capital for the sixth consecutive year, with 145 billionaires living in the city. Shanghai is listed second, followed by Shenzhen (#4), Hong Kong (#6), Hangzhou (#8) and Guangzhou (#9). This past year, the capital city added 35 billionaires.

$85 billion

is the net worth of 'Bottled Water King' Zhong Shanshan, who became the first Chinese national to make it into the Hurun Global Rich List Top 10. Known for popular bottled water brand Nongfu Springs, Zhong also has a venture in the pharmaceutical sector and is now the richest man in Asia. Drink up!

66%

is the percentage of the world's 231 'known' self-made women billionaires living in China. The China list is led by Zhong Huijuan, CEO of drugmaker Hansoh, with USD23 billion.

39 is the age of vaping brand Relx's founder Wang Ying. With a net worth of USD11 billion, she is the most successful self-made female entrepreneur under 40 in the world.

3%

is how much Huawei founder Ren Zhengfei's wealth dropped in 2020. Ren was one of the few to lose wealth in a year that saw many of the world's richest make more money than ever. Ren's wealth is closely tied to Huawei, which has been dealing with US sanctions as well as allegations over intellectual property theft.

How a Beijing Arts Collective is Growing Around the Globe

By Ryan Gandolfo

In 2016, a Beijing-based UK native, with charisma and a knack for making things happen, founded a project known as Spittoon Collective – cultivating a new multicultural community of creative thinkers. The concept started as a poetry night in a hutong that then expanded to other literary genres, art and music, adding color to a city in constant change.

Fast forward six years and the arts collective has spread like wildfire from the capital to Dali, from Ethiopia to Arizona. In the following pages, find out what makes this group of passionate individuals unique and how this project is being exported around the globe.

ing Spittoon

A Hutong Start

Matthew Byrne started something he can no longer turn off. The British poet moved to Beijing in 2013 and felt that the capital city's poetry scene was lacking. His obsession for starting poetry events inevitably led to the founding of the Spittoon Collective in May 2015. "[At the time], the hub of literary activity in Beijing was The Bookworm based in Sanlitun – that was the crystal palace, the beacon of light," Byrne tells us on a call from the UK to our Guangzhou office.

While Beijing's bona fide literary institution would go on to close in the fall of 2019, Spittoon would continue to grow as a community for poets and writers, as well as musicians and others in the creative scene.

Byrne describes the collective as a platform for people to share ideas, from literary works to different forms of art, with projects sprouting from the creative energy within the community.

While studying in Manchester, England, he organized a group called the Unsung Collective with a few friends where they published works from poets outside the university. "At the end of the month, we'd run a drunken, well-attended event, which was kind of the proto-Spittoon, and I didn't even know it," Byrne says.

Spittoon originally started as a poetry night at the now-defunct Mado Bar in Dongcheng district's Baochao Hutong. "In Beijing, you have these wonderful hutong, ancient structures and alleyways that you can walk down and visit cool bars, so I thought it would be good to have a poetry event as it seemed like poetry belonged very naturally to this area," Byrne tells us.

The readings would mainly be in English, but with an international community a new section called 'Poetry-in-Translation' was started, which featured works in Chinese, Afrikaans, French, Arabic, Russian, Spanish, Sinhalese and Mauritian Creole, among other languages.

Poetry and the diverse audience would turn out to be the "well-spring" for Spittoon's launch into other creative ventures, such as Spittoon Fiction, Spittoon Poetry Slam, Spittoon Storytelling and Spit-Tunes. "We created a kind of theme park-like atmosphere where every Thursday was occupied by a different literary genre or art form."

One of the collective's more successful projects to date has been Spit-Tunes, a blend of poetry and music that led to the founding of Poetry x Music, a band featuring writer Anthony Tao and classical guitarist Liane Halton.

Joining organized activities like Spittoon can serve as a lifesaver for those caught up in a unidimensional life. These groups are especially important in China as people need to build new relationships to find purpose while living in a different country.

In a May 2020 Harvard Business Review article, author Rob Cross notes four life connections that create purpose: spiritual, civic and volunteer, friends and community and family. But among these four connections, the argument can be made that friends and community surpass the

Spittoon Beijing

The objective now is to discover Chinese voices and broadcast them to the rest of the world

others, considering that some folks may not be spiritual, and their families are back home. Having a trusted network and sense of community can make the difference between a purposeful chapter or blimp on the radar of life.

As Spittoon gained momentum and more members were involved with various projects, friends and community became the adhesive in which the collective held together.

Beijing-based university teacher Zuo Fei, also known as Sophie, was connected to the collective after meeting some of the members in the spring of 2018. “It was quite an accident,” Zuo recalls over the phone from the capital city. “One of my American colleagues [at the university] told me about a translation workshop, and there I met Matthew and Simon Shieh, who was the original editor-in-chief of Spittoon Literary Magazine.”

Zuo started contributing translations to the magazine and enjoyed working together with new like-minded friends.

Spittoon started putting together a biannual literary magazine the same year the collective started up. The mag was comprised of a collection of the best English poetry and fiction they could find written in Beijing and Chengdu, along with a selection of articles, interviews and translation pieces.

Nowadays, Zuo and Shelly Shan, a poet currently based in Tokyo, are in charge of the magazine, which switched to publishing Chinese writers in translation. “The objective now is to discover Chinese voices and broadcast them to the rest of the world,” says Byrne. The issues, formerly sold at The Bookworm and now available on Weidian, combine a unique array of poetry and fiction with an aesthetically pleasing design.

But beyond the pages are the cultural exchanges made between local Chinese and expats volunteering on the project. Zuo describes the process of grouping native English speakers with Chinese speakers for translations in the magazine and the challenge of becoming a bilingual publication. “If we just use one language, then [the magazine] will be much easier [to make]. A bilingual version is way more difficult. I always tell people that the time and energy we put in is no less than that of a big publication or journal despite having fewer people to make it,” Zuo says.

The China bug bit me early... I thought China was really cool and wanted to live here forever

While she admits to feeling a bit of pressure putting it all together, she notes there is “strong support from other members.”

For the collective, Zuo and other Spittoon members aren't driven by financial interest but rather a passion to create and share ideas in the literary and arts scene. “I enjoy it very much – it's voluntary work, but sometimes I tell Matthew it's like the Spittoon job is getting more important than my regular job,” Zuo jokes.

Byrne has the same mindset, as his job in the UK is separate from his role as founder and director of the collective. “I think that's the strength of Spittoon. If we occupy the hobby space in peoples' lives, we can add meaning to their creative endeavors. The skills, experiences and personalities of people are naturally invested in the project.”

There's plenty of literature published about the importance of cultivating a passion outside of the workplace, especially during a pandemic which has caused many to reflect on their lives pre-COVID. We realize that a paycheck doesn't equal passion, and often our jobs don't quite enable us to be inventive or experiment the way we want. That's where a new side hustle or creative project comes into play.

One of the main benefits we've learned regarding Spittoon is the opportunity it gives members to create and contribute something new and involve others in the community. Byrne provides us with an example of the person running the collective's Instagram account, simply going beyond the pale after starting to attend their events in Beijing.

While his parents might be confused by his “obsession” with a project that doesn't benefit him financially, Byrne argues, “If so many people are interested in something that you created or managed, then it's difficult to let it go. You feel like it's somewhere that you've actually had an impact.”

China Calling

It wasn't long after Spittoon got started in Beijing that it found another home in spicy Sichuan province. Annie Leonard, the Spittoon Chengdu Leader, discovered a love for the PRC dating back to 2005 when her family moved from Detroit to Shanghai for a job with General Motors.

"The China bug bit me early... I thought China was really cool and wanted to live here forever," Leonard recalls over a phone call on her way to her Sichuanese husband's cafe.

The Harry Potter-themed shop, aptly named Harry's Wizard Cafe, is one of the locations where Spittoon members will get together in Chengdu for various literary events. "We'd like to make it into more of a cultural hub, kind of like what The Bookworm [Chengdu] used to be," says Leonard, who originally joined The Bookworm Writing Group before starting up the collective in the provincial capital.

She learned about Spittoon in 2017 after another group, the Loreli collective, interviewed her about Chengdu's writing community. From there, Leonard would go on to connect with Byrne and other members and start a new chapter for the arts collective. Spittoon Chengdu has since hosted monthly and bi-monthly events for poetry, prose, slams, competitions and music poetry – similar events to Beijing.

But Leonard points to one stark difference out in western China. "We are slightly different from Beijing as in we are more of a mix of locals and foreigners. Beijing was originally more expat-focused, but just by nature of Chengdu, there is a lot more integration of Chinese and a lot of foreigners here also speak good Chinese."

One of the events Leonard hosts bilingually is a multilingual night, which celebrates a lot more Chinese writing among other languages.

Chengdu is what Byrne describes as one of Spittoon's two established cities, while other collectives are forming in Shanghai, Xi'an, Shenzhen as well as Dali – the first Chinese-led Spittoon collective. From what we gather through Byrne and Leonard, it's the transient nature of expats in China that's led to new collectives forming in other urban areas – along with a passion for literary creation.

It does have its drawbacks, of course, as Zuo expresses that many of the friends made in Beijing sooner or later move on to the next chapter of their lives. "Every time someone has to leave, it's difficult. Many of my girlfriends are American, and they recently left – making every moment they're here something special," says Zuo.

On the other hand, there's a growing interest in poetry and other art forms among China's youth that keeps Spittoon expanding its audience in the Middle Kingdom. Zuo tells us about multiple aspects that encourage Chinese locals to participate, from having an opportunity to practice English speaking and writing in an international setting to learning more about themselves.

"Because the changes over the past 20 to 40 years [in China] have been so rapid, these days we realize it's time to take another look at ourselves, or in a cultural way to rethink the Chinese identity and traditional values in terms of poetry and literature," she says, adding that many people in the '80s who went to study and work abroad, especially in Western countries, are ready to return home. Zuo notes that China's younger generations are also showing an interest in foreign poetry.

She runs a WeChat platform called 外国诗歌精选 (Waiguo Shige Jingxuan), which introduces foreign poets and their translated works to Chinese readers. But beyond shared interests, Zuo describes her own reason for joining Spittoon as an opportunity to bridge the gap of language and cultural barriers between China and the West.

Spittoon isn't slowing down anytime soon. The success shared among Chinese cities has transcended the collective to the world at large. Byrne's excitement was apparent over the phone as he told us about up-and-coming collectives in Africa, Europe and the US – a sign of the potential for a group that started at a hutong bar.

"People find out about the community and join and then leave after their work contract ends, taking the seed of Spittoon elsewhere," says Leonard, noting that Spittoon collectives in Riga, Latvia, and Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, were started by two women who previously worked with the Chengdu collective. In Beijing, some of the early members have since left the capital and carried the project onto new destinations like Lisbon, Portugal, and Gothenburg, Sweden.

After getting mixed up with Spittoon three years ago, David Huntington has brought the group's creative energy to Tucson, Arizona, where he returned to school in August 2020. He volunteers as the managing web editor and has helped organize and host events in Beijing and Shanghai. Eventually, Huntington "missed it enough" when he got back, so he brought the brand to the US. "I felt like I hadn't noticed anything similar to [Spittoon] like an open mic night or poetry reading night, so I tried to start one, and it's worked out so far," he tells us over a WeChat call. Still in its early stage, Spittoon Tucson has done three meet-ups virtually as a result of the pandemic.

Huntington brings up a unique challenge that the collective doesn't encounter as much in China. "In the US and other places, it can be a bit intimidating to do literary events because it feels like it needs to be of a certain quality and approved by certain 'gatekeepers' and things like that," he says. However, he points out that Spittoon has demonstrated that there's a demand for participating in literary activities and that communities can be built without anyone having to approve it. "Without Spittoon, I wouldn't have had the gumption to come in and start an event."

Going

People find out about the community and join and then leave after their work contract ends, taking the seed of Spittoon elsewhere

As Spittoon continues to spread and empower individuals interested in language and culture, Byrne tells us that he's positioning himself more in the international center to try his luck at growing the collective more outside of the PRC. While still involved with the group's China operations, he says his "China timer was going off," which prompted a move back to the UK.

There are notable challenges for Spittoon, from funding projects such as the literary magazine to the mercurial nature of the collective's members. Byrne describes the hustle to gather resources at times, saying previous projects were funded through magazine sales, ticketed events and fundraising campaigns.

But some of Spittoon's challenges are also unique opportunities to share this all-encompassing literary and arts brand and its Chinese roots with the rest of the world. "The diversity in our output is really cool and sets us apart," he says, hinting at the possibilities of connecting Spittoon collectives overseas with the more established Chinese cities. He views China and Beijing, in particular, as the blueprint on how to grow the community into a global arts cluster. "If I create a [group] in the UK similar to Sweden, then that can be a conduit to draw out more content from China into the UK that's generated from within China," he says, suggesting potential projects like linking university students with Chinese poets to create dialogue through postcard poetry.

His ideas racing over the phone, Byrne's passion for Spittoon is contagious, and we hope to see it thrive for years to come.

HU XIAOHONG

CIEO Deputy Brand
Director

Interview by Joshua Cawthorpe

The importance of education in China is no surprise, but some key areas of inequality have been highlighted across the education sector in recent years. For starters, only a fraction of China's labor force graduates from high school. A comprehensive study by education startup Zuoyebang and Beijing Normal University also revealed a noticeable difference in the difficulty of math problems between wealthy first-tier city neighborhoods and poor city districts and rural areas. With 73% of China's primary and middle school students residing in third- to sixth-tier cities and rural towns, education inequality needs to be addressed in a more pressing manner.

Several initiatives have sprung up to begin bridging the equity gap in education. One such program, founded in 2013, is the Canadian International Education Organization (CIEO) Education Fund, which was established in partnership with the Foshan Children's Welfare Association to provide support and resources to families and underfunded schools in rural areas. The fund aims to address some of these vulnerabilities and create opportunities for students that might otherwise fall through the cracks. We reached out to CIEO Deputy Brand Director Hu Xiaohong to learn how they are helping students from far and near.

How long has the charity been operating?

The CIEO Education Foundation is a private foundation approved by the Guangdong Provincial Civil Affairs Bureau in 2013, to provide help to underprivileged children. So far, it has been operating for eight years. As an educational group, CIEO will always stick to the philosophy we believe in – 'Education is Love.' CIEO believes that in addition to transferring knowledge to children, it is more important to let children learn to be grateful, understand generosity and be willing to help others in need. Cultivating social responsibility and compassion is as important as cultivating knowledge.

"Cultivating social responsibility and compassion is as important as cultivating knowledge"

What were the foundation's goals last year and did the epidemic change the desired outcomes?

Being private, the CIEO Education Foundation does not have a specific fundraising goal, but the purpose of the foundation has always been to support the education of children in need. Each year, the foundation develops a plan for how to carry out projects and how best to respond to the current circumstances. In the face of COVID-19, the CIEO Education Foundation launched a special fundraising initiative for CIEO family members to 'Cheer for Wuhan,' and raised nearly RMB80,000 in just a few days. All the funds raised were donated to the Guangzhou Charity Association to support the epidemic prevention and control work in Wuhan.

During the outbreak, the foundation's other projects continued as scheduled. CIEO Education Foundation donated a library to the Guangdong Provincial Education Foundation. It also donated daily supplies for students at Jiayi Central School, located in Sichuan's Jinyang county, and then donated financial aid to the Foshan Children's Welfare Association's project – 'Care for Children· Let the Dream Fly.' Lastly, the foundation also donated educational equipment and facilities to the Women's Federation of Panyu District, Guangzhou.

What is the criteria and selection process for determining which students/regions will receive support?

The CIEO Education Foundation's funding and public welfare activities are centered on supporting education by funding teaching facilities and equipment in remote mountainous areas and providing assistance to families and children in need. We will provide financial aid to students who are excellent in both character and study as well as reward excellent teachers. Each year, the CIEO Education Foundation's Board of Directors will decide which projects to support in consultation with the city and district charity associations.

Can you tell us about the goals for the coming year?

In 2021, The CIEO Education Foundation will continue to support 10 children from families in need in Foshan, 10 children from families in Guangzhou as well as families in Gaozhou. Furthermore, the foundation also plans to help schools in Guizhou's Bijie city and other rural primary schools by donating libraries, educational supplies, multimedia equipment and other resources.

LIVING ROOM

Reading Corner

There is nothing better than cuddling up for a bedtime story, your little one looking at the pictures as you read to them. But sometimes, let's be honest – whether it is because they have already had five books and show no sign of relenting, or you have just had an exhausting day – it is time to take the sleep mood up a notch. That's when we turn the lights off and get a story up on our phone – on the condition they lie down and close their eyes as we read them one last tale.

One fun option is sooperbooks.com, which has loads of options, often fun Roald Dahl-style rhymes. They are broken up into five-minute stories, 10-minute stories and free stories. We've always stuck to the free stories, but you can subscribe if the repertoire starts running thin. Scan the QR code to start reading.

Another collection – this one all completely free – can be found at storiestogrowby.org. Once again broken up, this time into five-minute stories, 10-minute stories and more, the selection here is huge and spans the earliest ages to stories recommended for 12+, so one to keep returning to. Ending English?

China Considers Dropping English as Core Subject, Again

By Joshua Cawthorpe

A proposal at the Two Sessions, China's most important annual political event, to remove English as a compulsory subject for primary and middle school students has resulted in a fierce online debate on the value of the language in today's China.

CPPCC National Committee member, Xu Jin, proposed the change on March 4 on the basis that less than 10% of university graduates use English for work, according to China Daily.

Xu suggested that more emphasis should be put on physical education, music and art. Additionally, he argued that technology like AI real-time translation software will eliminate the language barrier, and translators will be a profession that is soon eliminated.

Netizens and experts against the proposal contest that learning English helps students develop critical thinking and cultural awareness. Authorities in China have maintained their position towards openness on the global stage, and many critics see the removal of English as a step backward in this pursuit.

Removing it as a compulsory subject would also require the gaokao, the national standardized university entrance exam, to be revised. The gaokao was previously separated into four parts: Chinese language, Math, English and a choice between either Science or Humanities. Reforms to the gaokao resulted in more flexibility with elective subjects and specialized sciences, but the core three remain the same, according to World Education Services (WES).

The gaokao, which takes place over three days in June, is already a source of controversy. The pressure to achieve a high score is enforced from a young age, and gaokao-related suicides have made headlines in recent years. Students who do not get high gaokao scores and cannot obtain a university degree are often trapped in low-paying jobs with little opportunity for upward social mobility.

The hashtag related to Xu's proposal had been viewed more than 140 million times on Weibo as of press time. A poll conducted by China Youth Daily found that 43% of respondents supported its removal while 48% believe English is crucial to globalization. Many Weibo users pointed out that scientific papers were largely published in English.

According to Statista, English is the most spoken language worldwide with just under 1.35 billion speakers, while Mandarin Chinese ranks second with 1.12 billion.

One Weibo user said that learning English was more beneficial for finding work than studying calculus or classical Chinese poetry. However, many netizens lamented the focus on test-taking English and grammar, suggesting that it should become more focused on oral communication with a lower level of difficulty.

A common theme in the comments section of a China Newsweek Weibo post was the concern that 'elite families' who could afford extra-curricular English classes would gain another unfair advantage in the highly competitive education system.

After a 12-year hiatus due to the Cultural Revolution, Deng Xiaoping brought back the gaokao in 1977. As part of the 'Reform and Opening Up,' Deng's first rendition of the gaokao included an English exam, according to BBC. The English language then became a compulsory subject for schools in 2001 — the same year that China joined the World Trade Organization.

Since then, proposals to scale back its importance have become common.

During the Two Sessions in 2014, Chinese officials proposed to lower the portion of the total gaokao score or remove English from the exam altogether. Instead of removing the foreign language, the Ministry of Education allowed the English portion to be taken twice during the year, with the higher score submitted to help relieve pressure from students come June.

Then again, in 2017, a Chinese lawmaker and director of Yuhua Education Group (a publicly-traded company valued at just under HKD3 billion) called for English to become one of the elective subjects on the gaokao, Global Times reported.

The English requirements, which can affect admission to notable middle and high schools, have led to a booming for-profit English education industry. Among countries worldwide, Chinese students attend university overseas by a massive margin. According to UNESCO, China sent just under one million students to study abroad in 2018, while North America and Western Europe combined sent 766,383 students abroad.

A Businesswire.com report on the English Language Training market in China speculates a compound annual growth rate of USD69.5 billion from 2020-2024.

In December 2019, WES reported that some 400,000 English teachers were employed in China, some working illegally despite government efforts to lift and enforce standards. These numbers have most likely decreased due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

PLANNING A POST-PANDEMIC CAREER

How Executives can Prepare Themselves to Weather any Storm

It's been over a year since the Covid-19 pandemic began, but it is still taking its toll on economies worldwide. This uncertainty has made many professionals think about the skills and qualifications that can help them disaster-proof and future-proof their careers. Those with managerial experience may find themselves eyeing an MBA to help accelerate their journey along the career ladder.

"There are usually five reasons a manager would pursue an executive MBA," says David Dufour, director of the International MBA for Executives at Xi'an Jiaotong-Liverpool University's International Business School Suzhou. "These would be to expand their vision beyond their current job function, learn new and applicable skills, grow their networks, give their careers an international dimension and gain new opportunities."

The IMBA, a part-time course delivered entirely in English, does all these things, particularly giving careers a level of international applicability.

"Of the 15 academic staff in the IMBA programme, there are 11 different nationalities," says Dufour. "Our teachers also have at least 10 years of presence in China, so they can teach their topic with a Chinese understanding. We favour practitioners because they can bring their corporate experience to the role."

The school's high quality staff and teaching excellence have led to IBSS becoming the youngest business school in the world to be awarded the coveted 'triple crown' of business school accreditation (AACSB, EQUIS, and AMBA).

"The Triple Crown is a demonstration of the quality of our programmes," says Dufour. "Particularly the latest one from the Association of MBAs, which we received in December 2020."

Long-lasting Benefits

Kirsten Johnston, owner of branding agency JWDC and a 2019 IBSS IMBA alumna, says she chose the programme because it ticked several crucial boxes for her: a credible business school, offering a part-time English-led programme and one not too far from her home in Shanghai.

"Having experience in Australia and the UK, I initially wanted to pursue an MBA to gain a better understanding of the Chinese business landscape. But I got so much more – not only did I learn about cross-border business, but I also learned more about how the company engine works. I felt more in control of my company."

Dufour says entrepreneurs and business owners are a growing group within the programme. "We're seeing an increase in entrepreneurs who are looking for better management skills and better ways to develop their companies or investments," he explains.

Jeff Zihao Cao, VP Strategic Development China for ArrowFast and Chair of the IMBA alumni club, completed his IMBA in 2018. The programme gave him a greater sense of confidence, he says: "When I moved to a job in the healthcare sector in 2020, I was nervous, because this industry was uncharted territory for me. But the IMBA really helped me. Not only did it give me the tools to help me adapt to my new role faster, but I also gained a valuable network of peers who I could turn to for advice."

In addition to the network of professionals, students have said one of the most valuable aspects of the programme is the dissertation. Johnston says: "A few weeks ago, I did a presentation with a big property company here in China, and actually pulled a lot of my information from that dissertation. It's still very valid today."

Cao believes that an MBA is more than a qualification: "I always tell people who are thinking of getting an MBA that it's not a panacea. It's not going to solve all your problems. What it is, is a catalyst. It can facilitate you to progress faster, and to help you transform your career."

The International Business School Suzhou is accepting applications for its International MBA for Executives until mid-August for the 2021/2022 academic year. For more information, please scan the QR code.

Dulwich College Shanghai Pudong Wizard of Oz

Dulwich College Shanghai Pudong Senior School students delivered three knockout performances of The Wizard of Oz on March 11-13. They were happy to be able to host a small number of parents in-person in the theater, essential for the performing experience, and were thrilled to see over 700 parents tune in to the livestream. The timeless themes of adventure, friendship and appreciation for home really resonated with the community. Said Caroline Taylor, Head of College: "Many students have played less visible, but extremely important roles bringing our Senior School production to life. Only with everyone playing their part can the show truly go on."

Dulwich Puxi Bursts into Color with A Midsummer Night's Dream

Dulwich College Shanghai Puxi students performed the Shakespeare classic, A Midsummer Night's Dream. A black and white world burst into color with dancing, disagreements and disco! Exploding with humor, this play is an example of Shakespeare's finest poetry. This year our amazing all-star student cast was supported by our first student tech crew who designed, plotted and ran the technical and backstage elements of the performance.

100 Ways to Celebrate 100 Days of School!

On Monday, 22 February, SSIS celebrated 100 Days of School with many creative and inspiring activities. For Pre-nursery, Nursery and K1, each child wore on a T-shirt with either 100 items or the numeral '100' on it; K2 children dressed up as (tiny) 100-year-old people. Each Primary grade worked on a particular 100 theme, which afforded learning from mathematics to English to sustainability. The milestone afforded us the time to reflect on what we had learned and reminded ourselves about what we could still achieve for the rest of the academic year.

Dulwich International High School Zhuhai Pledges to Raise the Bar for International Education in China's Greater Bay Area

Dulwich International High School Zhuhai, or Dulwich Zhuhai, hosted a group of British government officials on March 11, including Ms. Jo Hawley, HM Consul-General to Guangzhou, Mr. David Bull, Director for Regional Affairs, Greater Bay Area, British Consulate-General Guangzhou and other Guangzhou-based officials with the British Department for International Trade. The officials paid a visit to Dulwich Zhuhai's new campus in the Hengqin new district and held talks with the management teams of Dulwich College International and Dulwich Zhuhai as well as engaged with students at its current campus.

Dulwich International High School Zhuhai was jointly founded by Dulwich College International and Zhuhai Huafu Education in 2010. It has announced that it will move to its brand-new campus in August 2021 and will recruit 110 new students for the new school year. These new students will join the existing 300 students who will move from the existing campus in Xiangzhou district.

The 17,000-square-meter new campus is located at Huandao Bei Lu in Zhuhai's Hengqin New District, with buildings designed with the concept of integrating the beauty of the traditional Lingnan architecture of southern China and the iconic Dulwich-style British college buildings. The new campus is purpose-designed and equipped with the latest technology and equipment to facilitate advanced learning. The high-standard indoor air quality management system promotes health and wellbeing of all students, staff members and parents and can host up to 800 students in the future.

Horoscopes

Finally, a horoscope that understands your life in China.

By Rakini Bergundy

Aries

3.21~4.20

It is crucial to start finding the small joys of living in China. Whether that means the ability to seamlessly browse Dianping or score cheap clothes on Taobao.

Taurus

4.21~5.21

You may personally feel like you're 'over' Covid but please, please remember to still wear your mask in public spaces, Taurus.

Gemini

5.22~6.21

Be deliberate and organized in your actions. Try to use the tag function in WeChat for all your new contacts. Stay ahead of all those random requests.

Cancer

6.22~7.22

It may be the North American way to split bills evenly at every dinner, but your friends are sniffing out your cheap ways. Try and treat them every so often.

Leo

7.23~8.23

Politeness and flirtatiousness are two separate things. Get it straight Leo and own up to your actions.

Virgo

8.24~9.23

Typically, you're very good at enforcing your boundaries and standards. However, you've been stretching yourself too thin.

Libra

9.24~10.23

A big move is in the cards in your near future. Don't worry, you got this. A new start is exactly what you need.

Scorpio

10.24~11.22

Great things are coming your way, Scorpio. Your diligence and meticulous habits will pay off soon - and in big fashion.

Sagittarius

11.23~12.21

Sagittarius, you seem to be living like you're still 20 and on daddy's credit card. Maturity is something you need to grasp sooner than later.

Capricorn

12.22~1.20

You've been hurt and it's hard to trust, Capricorn. Don't give into raw emotions. Take a deep breath and drink some jasmine tea.

Aquarius

1.21~2.19

Don't blame others who seem to have life all figured out. If you're looking to grow, buckle down and try making some real plans for the next step.

Pisces

2.20~3.20

Stop caring what people think. If you want to start a Douyin or Xiaohongshu account, do it! This is the place to explore your inner influencer.
